This week I've received telephone calls and emails and greeting cards –all with good wishes from more friends in my building. And as I pass by my open window or the doorways in the hall, I get a hint of something delicious cooking; and warm memories of my grandmother's cooking flood into my thoughts.

One hundred years ago, my grandmother lived in the Polish shtetl of Glowitz (Glowaczow). I didn't grow up in a shtetl like my grandmother, but I feel I have some understanding of what her life was like. Neighbours helped each other (like lending a pot). They always had time for a small chat about the family or the price of matzah; and they always parted with a greeting for good health or a "happy holiday". Neighbours were more than just someone to whom you said good morning on your way out the door; they were friends, in every sense of the word. They were friends who shared simchahs and sorrows and the little pleasures of everyday life.

So as I reflect on this week before Pesach, I feel happy. I feel the joy of the approach of spring and the holidays. I feel the "warmth" of the sharing, of the smiles, and of the happy greetings from friends, acquaintances and even, strangers. The Primrose is My Shtetl.

Counting the Omer with Cancer

By Barbara Center

Reaching ...

Reaching ...

Reaching for meaning ...

In the upside-down cake of my world.

I pluck a star

from my six-pointed tradition, and ride the tsunami waves

Home to the majestic shore.

When Moses and the Jewish people crossed the Red Sea out of Egypt, they spent 49 days in the desert, spiritually preparing themselves to receive the Torah, or Five Books of Moses, at Mount Sinai. The tradition of counting the days in 7 weekly cycles continues to the present time, giving each of us an opportunity to refine our expressions of Lovingkindness, Discipline, Compassion, Endurance, Humility, and Bonding, culminating in Nobility.

Although I was diagnosed with lymphoma in 2011, I had my first chemotherapy treatment on April 25, 2012, during the weekly cycle of Compassion. Extending compassion to my own body, mind, and heart - including the cancer and chemotherapy drugs that were making me so sick - was the first step in extending compassion to the world. I learned it is impossible to walk in another person's shoes without fully nurturing and embracing my own life journey.

The week following treatment called for Endurance, knowing that I could make it through one day at a time. Survival became a state of mind, as I allowed the tsunami of physical side-effects to run its course. I was still captain of my own ship.

By the third week I began losing my hair. My challenge moved from physical to emotional. That's when the penny dropped. I was no longer in control of the image in the mirror. I had to surrender vanity for Humility. I am deeply humbled every time I touch or see my baldness. All that I took for granted is seeking love and care and nurturing now. When I catch myself spiralling into self-pity, I draw on the inspiration of friends who have had alopecia since youth. They've fashioned a radiant image for themselves that's irresistible!

My second chemotherapy treatment took place in the hospital during the Bonding cycle. I deepened connections with close family and friends who visited me and reaffirmed that I am not alone. I opened up to allow people to see me less than my best. By the end of this journey I'll proudly say I have no masks left.

As my 49-day meditation draws to a close, I reach for the last of the seven attributes - Nobility - the majesty of the human spirit that is always with me.

Visiting the Place of Guilt

By Sophie Soil

I've come here to grieve..... with the whole of me, I trek across this guilty field of vanished flesh and bone and lives; this place of homicidal ferocity once; of human brutality and massacre, where death still gloats triumphant; where the ghosts circling the semi-crimson terrain that witnessed slaughtered dreams and humans still roam restless; where the army of death, wearing crooked crosses on their arms, tattooed numbers on unwilling skin, to snuff out any shred of identity, of dignity from bleeding hearts; where men, women, children, scared of their own shadows, were starved and beaten and ripped apart; shot and burned and tortured into admitting they deserve it; where the ghosts of then are clearly seen still in the morning fog, with their bony hands fused to foregone faces with eyes that see no hopeful view, and the scorn and pain they felt cuts into my own being like a Black and Decker into living flesh.....

I know: this is not a woman's duty....but it doesn't mean a thing when you've rammed inside yourself incredible new rules that this place has wakened.... who else? who else has earned that right?
who's been scattered into this mournful wind of now?
who will leave a piece of me buried in this odious graveyard?

who else here and now to utter that solemn cry?
that prayer meant to lay at rest the souls of the departed?
who else is here? no one else but me, pleading with the sky.
I open the book. hear myself exhale the Kaddish:
Yit-gadal V-yit kadash Sh-mey Raba.....

they will hear.....they will forgive.....
I will not.....cannot.....

From the Bottom of the Mikvah

By Anna Gersman

From the bottom of the mikvah your puzzled faces ripple,
Young arms like doves wings encircle each other.
Your turn is next.
How could you know that it is you that brought me to this underwater place of rebirth?
Without you there is no reason to go up against my childhood of ridiculed saints and smashed Madonnas.

You gave me courage to forsake the pain of hidden Bibles and forbidden rosary beads,
To reclaim my spirit.
For you I lit candles, covered my eyes, and let my hands slowly circle the flames,
I struggled with the strange holy words, the silver goblet held high.
Sweet kosher wine mingling with sesame flecked challah,
Together we learned about the great flood, Devorah's bravery, Joseph's dreams and Moses' call.
For you I hang shimmering blue fabric pinned with colourful paper fish, a Reed Sea,
We ascend basement stairs together, the Promised Land an embroidered heirloom tablecloth laden with Ashkenazi tunes,
With you I cross over from a place of no faith,
Become rooted in a world of ritual and story, a garden chuppah, Bat Mitzvah celebrations, havdallah sunsets, strengthened for the dark shadows of grief and despair.

Reflections in Shul

By Judith Ungar Weinryb

He looked at me and I could see his life unfold as in a dream
Unraveling before my eyes
An open book of truth not lies

Remembering the wretched pain
Memories like tepid rain flow softly down his wrinkled face
He longs to return to a far away place

Just nine years old, he could not comprehend how the love he had cherished could suddenly end Asleep in the forest, he had tired after play
How he'd wished he had never awakened that day

His family perished, destroyed by vile hate
He wondered why he had been spared their cruel fate
His face recalls the shock and sadness
Serenity replaced by madness

He never returned, though his heart is still there to the small wooden cottage that went up in flames
In shul during Yizkor he utters a prayer
Seeing their images, whispering their names

At Kiddush, I see his face light up with laughter as grandchildren run towards his beckoning arms
Sadness is nowhere, just comforting kisses
They love his great stories, are warmed by his charms

His life is like an open book
I turn away, I cannot look

The Erstwhile Brisket

By Amy Gabriel

"Not because you are more numerous than any people did the Lord delight in you and choose you, for you are the least of all the peoples.
But because of the Lord's love for you, and because He keeps the oath He swore to your forefathers, the Lord…redeemed you from the house of bondage"
~ Deuteronomy 7:7-8

Haste, my meaty muse, and teach my lips,
Which stand the ruddy sentries of my tongue,
To chant the meat majestic's glorious song,
With fulsome stomach, hearty throat and lung.
I sing the brisket, rich and red and raw,
Which yonder peasant plunges to the pot –
A Hercules, now wreathed in flame of fire,
Most succulent, most vigorous, most hot.
So cook, my sweet; let soar your saucy smell
To tease the little boys in Hebrew school,
And ride the wind to lift the spirits of
The zeide who comes tottering from shul.
The bubbie with the babies lifts her head
When, dancing on the breeze with faeries' feet,
You pass beneath her nose and fill her mind
With visions valiant dripping with moist meat.
Cook on! Soon o'er the hot, your beefy red
Shall turn to brown, as sweet as a knish.

And now your peasant lifts his mighty knife,
And radiant slices fall onto his dish.
From thence, befriend the bold gefilte fish
And kugel grand that verge your mighty flanks,
But think not your companions on the plate
Are worthy only of the lower ranks.
For now—wait! hush!—they all have gathered round;
Now hear the murmured prayer, the blessing said.
One glass of wine, and two, and someone broke
The middle piece of the unleavened bread.
And we recall: "Not greatness, nor our size,
Impelled HaShem to choose us from above,
For we were small, and could not save ourselves,
But He is great, and all His ways are love.
In Egypt we were slaves; He heard our cry,
Redeemed us, and is the redemption still.
Without Him, we are slaves; but with Him, kings;
Grace is His erstwhile, everlasting will.
And so, bring out the food that He has giv'n!
Tonight we dine like kings from royal plates.
Brisket, come forth! And all, stretch out your hands—"
Still the third cup, Redemption, gleaming waits.
And now—your peasant lord seizes his fork
And to his lips he bears you, past his heart.
One moment, mayhap two—and you are naught,
Yet, erstwhile brisket, everlasting art.

Moish's Last Pesach

By Paula Hurwitz

My great-granddaughter Madeline came to visit today. She has to write a story for school about a special family seder. She was struggling to come up with something based on her all of eight years' experience, so her mother brought her to me for help. Being the matriarch, I've got a bit of a reputation as the keeper of our family lore and, like usual, I don't think I disappointed.

First, I pulled out the old family photo I keep tucked away in a dresser drawer, right under my wedding picture and a few snaps of my babies. It always transports me to a seder many, many years ago - Pesach 1943. Now most people associate that Pesach with the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, but for me it's more personal than that. Not that I don't share our people's pride in those brave fighters, or mourn their eventual defeat, but I can't think of that night without grieving for my brother, Moish.

I pulled Maddy up on my lap and showed her the picture. It's black and white, of course, creased and smudged in places from years of being handled, a little torn on the sides where an elastic band dug into it. She squinted at it as I pointed to Moish. I can still make him out clearly, right in the middle of the back row, his uniform freshly pressed, his hat cocked over his right ear, standing behind my mother, his hand resting on her shoulder, the trademark grin on his face. That night we were all smiling for the camera, but we already knew about Moish's mobilization orders and you can see the tension in the way Mame's hands gripped her apron.

Tate sat to Mame's left, looking more bemused by the squirming grandson on his lap than pleased to be surrounded by his large family. We were all there, my brothers, sisters, in-laws, nieces and nephews. Maddy never knew my parents, even her mother didn't, and most of my brothers and sisters were gone before Maddy was born, but she laughed at her grandmother, a little golden-haired girl sitting on my sister Sadie's lap, her head turned away from the camera as she stared over her shoulder at the cousin in her father's arms. She was always jealous when not the centre of his attention.

That night was more than a seder, I explained, looking up as my granddaughter dragged her chair closer so she could inspect the picture too. It was a goodbye party. His training complete, Moish would be shipped to England less than a month after the picture was taken. After that, we had no idea what would happen, but the RCAF was in the thick of it, running bombing raids over Germany almost every night. So Mame had reason to be nervous, though Moish did everything he could to reassure her.

Mame was horrified when Moish enlisted, but he was young and confident, like all the boys were. Besides, though we'd only heard bits and pieces of what was going on in Europe, we knew enough. My parents, and their friends, prayed every night for the aunts, uncles and cousins left behind in Kishinev, there'd been no news in months. So all the boys in the neighborhood were signing up. I explained to Maddy how different it was back then. Now you hardly ever see a Jewish boy in uniform, unless he's fighting for Israel, of course. But then my younger sister, Baby, went dancing with a different soldier every Saturday night, and Tate wouldn't let her go with the gentile boys. Maddy laughed at the thought of her elderly great-great aunt dating and dancing. The boys all looked so handsome in their uniforms. Moish had no shortage of dates either, though at 20 he was more interested in hanging out with his buddies and flying planes.

Despite the war, Pesach preparations were the same as every year. My older sister and I cooked in our own kitchens for days then arrived carrying casserole dishes covered in stained tea towels and soup pots to help Mame feed the large crowd. On the second night we married ones would disperse to spend an evening with our in-laws, but tonight was about our family and we all slipped into our customary roles.

My oldest brother and his wife were always the bossy "know-it-alls" – and she wasn't even such a great cook, though she sure thought she was. My older sister and I were inseparable. We did everything together, putting our youngest children in the same playpen while we worked and gossiped in the kitchen. Moish was, well Moish, the handsome fearless pilot. My youngest brother was quiet, and sort of distant then. He wasn't old enough to enlist and a bit jealous of Moish. And, Baby, well I've already described her partying ways, but we were all a little to blame for that, the way we spoiled her from the moment Mame brought her home from the hospital.

As close as I was to my sisters, Moish was always my favourite growing up. Only 11months younger than I, he followed me around from the moment he could crawl. When I married, he gave the toast at my wedding, promising he'd find a wife and they'd buy the house next door so we'd always be together. Not that any of us had money for houses at the time. We lived with my in-laws for the first decade of our marriage, Moish still lived at home when he wasn't at flight school. I started to cry a little when I explained to Maddy how all those hopes and dreams can be shattered in an instant. Truthfully, I think I scared her a little bit, it's not often a little girl sees an old lady cry. She gently climbed off of my lap and crawled into her mother's.

The seder went well into the night, as they usually did when the whole family gathered around the card tables that stretched from end to end in the basement. The littlest ones fell asleep in a nest of coats on Mame and Tate's bed even before we found the afikoiman. But after we'd opened the door for Elijah, sang the last round of Chad Gadyah and raised our glasses to "Next Year in Jerusalem", my husband put our littlest one, Maddy's Grandma, over his shoulder while I kissed everyone goodbye. I saved Moish for last, as if somehow we knew this goodbye was especially important. He hugged me hard and told me he'd stop by before he left.

But, life got busy and somehow that never happened. Within the month he was based in England, flying Lancasters at night over Germany and occupied Europe. Of course we only found that out after he was gone, when two men in uniform knocked on Mame's door and told her Moish wouldn't be coming home. He wasn't even overseas long enough to send us a letter.

Mame sent Baby to get Tate at work, then to gather the rest of us. The kind officers stayed by her side until we arrived, as she cried quietly into the hanky that was always tucked up her sleeve, then explained again what happened, though it took long after that second explanation for it to sink in.

They said Moish was a hero, and I suppose he was. But like those poor Ghetto fighters he never lived to see another Pesach, and though his actual Yahrzeit's some weeks later, not another seder's passed by without my remembering my favourite brother. And since I'm not likely to partake in many more seders of my own, when Maddy left I tucked that old photo in her hand and asked her to pass it on to her children and grandchildren so that every family seder will be a tribute to my brave and handsome brother who lost his life defending our people's right to celebrate Pesach.

B'H Elusive Elijah

By Ester Zirkind

Manchester, England, 1963.

The blue carpet was especially thinned near the doorways. Kasriel did not need to see where he was; the carpet's thickness told him all he needed to know. The game had become irksome. Three already out, he grew tired of winning. He pulled off the scratchy scarf from his eyes and looked about. Two brothers and one sister were sitting on the couch - waiting for him to be out; unabashed in showing their displeasure. One lone brother, still in the game, stood at the fireplace on the far side of the room. He shrugged his shoulders, threw him the scarf and left.

They had come to Manchester to get away from the fever that is London. Prestwich was a little suburb near the city where Zaida taught mathematics to the boys at Manchester Jewish High; and where Bubba could walk down her quiet little street, up a small hill at the bottom and purchase a train ticket to town to go shopping in the Arndale centre.

There would be no shopping now, not for a long time.

Kasriel went up the stairs passing two windows with thick white ledges; an overgrown African violet on one, and an orchid on the other. Both pots placed on china plates, well watered and clean. The second floor was small, much smaller than the first. Across the top of the stairs, the door to his grandparents' room was open. He peeked in. It was an elegant room. Cream colour chiffon curtains billowed in as the wind whipped at the little house. The antique dresser stood on ornate gold legs and had a marble top with a three-way mirror; lacy coverlets were draped over the chair. The cream walls matched perfectly with the wardrobes and drawers and bay windows caught the afternoon sun. As beautiful as the room was, he felt it wrong to linger. Zaida would not want to come upstairs and find someone in his room.

He went to the room next door, the room he shared with four others whenever they came up north to "get-away." These walls had been painted azure blue with a matte finish that gave the room an unmistakable coldness. There was permanent condensation on the windows that Kasriel had confused with glass. The brown furniture was clean and new. In the centre of the wall of wardrobes there was a mirror that opened to a hidden compartment. It had a small light fixture above. In a corner of the room lay a messy heap of laundry. The beds had been made by impatient hands. Here and there were strewn about books, Jerusalem Posts and Jewish Chronicles. He picked up the faded, dog-eared reprint of his bar mitzvah maamar from the night table, and set about reviewing.

While studying he heard the children starting a new game, but he was soon sound asleep. When he awoke it was dark outside and the smell of frying came wafting up. What time was it?

Turning to get out of bed, he rubbed his cold feet and found an extra pair of socks. The bathroom door was closed. He knocked lightly, waited a bit and turned to go downstairs.

Bubba was standing over the stovetop, gauging the gas under the hot oil and dipping her long wooden spoon into the bubbling pot. On her head she wore a tichel made from the identical floral material as her housecoat. As she worked she hummed, but it was impossible to hear a melody in her humming as she favoured the high notes and only the high notes.

"When's supper?"

"Oh! You startled me," she held her head hand to her chest. "Soon. Would you set the table? There's a dear." Kasriel washed his hands and began collecting crockery.

The kitchen was tiny, but functional. Every corner had been worked to capacity. One of the counters was removable. When Bubba served dairy she used the blue side, when she served a meat meal she used the red. The pantry was a little room under the stairs. It was lined with shelves that followed the pattern of the stairs, breaking off at longer intervals the further down the wall it went. The highest and shortest was the shelf where Bubba stashed the treats she had bought for when the grandchildren would come up from London. Always among her little collection was a bar of white chocolate.

The front door opened and closed quickly: Zaida's hallmark – for Zaida was a military man who had sat in the trenches during WW1 and had adopted the army's habits for life. He walked through the kitchen door still wearing his grey hat with his trench coat over one arm. He was a short man with a grey beard that was carefully groomed. "I say dear, there's quite a wind going."

"I hear it. Go get ready for supper, I'll be serving soon."

Nearing the stove he opened the various pots and inhaled. "Ah yes," he said, winking at his grandson, "that's the stuff to feed the troops!" Smiling at his own remark, he left to ready himself for the evening meal.

Later that evening, when the little ones had been put two to a bed – for that is how they slept when they came up to Manchester – Kasriel's mother, Mrs. Knecht, sat down heavily on one of the brown upholstered armchairs in the living room. The wind had picked up from the afternoon and was now howling. The neat hedges that formed the fence around the front and back gardens swayed under its force. The rose bushes that Zaida cared for with the tenderness of an old English squire squeaked as they were driven in the direction of the blasts.

"I don't know what I am to do," the mother worriedly remarked to no one in particular. "Kasriel's bar mitzvah is less than three months away and I still have not ordered the tfillin. Last time I was more organized...."

"How come you've left it so late?" said Zaida, peering at her over his grey-rimmed glasses, his mathematics journal crinkling in his hands.

"Oh Dad, do I have to answer that question?"

"Well I suppose not...." he sighed, returning to his reading.

"Well, if you must know..."

"No I don't must know. I'm sure you had your reasons," Zaida said, apologizing to the world for having questioned his daughter. Bubba cleared her throat and sent a maddened stare towards her husband. When he did look her way she flashed a warning: "stay clear," which he heeded with the weariness of years spent under the storms of the women in his life.

"I suppose I should go back to Sampson," said Mrs. Knecht, "though I wanted to avoid going to him. My circumstances have changed so much since the last time."

"May I make a suggestion?" Bubba queried. "Why not just buy an ordinary pair from the Judaica stores? Why go to the expense of having them custom made? It's not as if you have the money right now. Maybe later in life he can upgrade...." But as she spoke, her daughter's face became more determined. With each word uttered, her eyes burned deeper and her lips knit closer.

"No! No son of mine will have just any tfillin. I went to great lengths to buy the best set for my oldest and I will not lower my standards, though it'll be harder now. Tfillin are the most important part of a bar mitzvah. It is not the party, but the tfillin that should be the focus. I will spend less on the party and will pay off slowly for the tfillin, but Mom..." she looked directly at her mother now, "...this is my decision, and I will deal with it."

A week later, back in London, Rabbi Sampson stood at his front door. "It's a bit late Mrs. Knecht. I'm not so sure that I can accommodate you this time, in such short notice." Rabbi Sampson was a big man who dressed in the traditional Jewish garb: white shirt and black pants, held up with suspenders, over which lay his tzitzit. On his head was perched a large black yamulke covering most of his flaming red hair; his red beard almost reaching his ample waist. "But come down anyway, we will see what we can do."

He invited her into the house and through a doorway that led to a staircase going down to the cellar. His head automatically bowed as he passed the lintel that otherwise would have hit him. Once down she stood riveted by the sight of a scribe's workplace. In one corner there were frames of stretched out cow skins, drying white and hard. Parchments rolled and ready were placed on shelves that lined the back wall. On an old wooden table, ink was being prepared in a slowly moving, softly humming mixer. Next to it there lay a bundle of feathers waiting to be made into quills. On the right were scrolls of the scriptures, finished and available for purchase. Above them were boxes that held various sized mezuzot to fit most doorways. To her left there were three or four Torah scrolls draped in yellowing woolen prayer shawls – talleisim. They looked like stacked people. Taped to his worktable were thin parchments containing the verses that would be placed inside the blackened boxes of the tfillin. He had been in the middle of writing. The very air breathed was of sacred antiquity. One spoke in respectful whispered tones when one entered such a place, so as not to awaken the spirits that seemed to lie all around.

"Nu, Rabbi Sampson, you've got to help me. I know it's late, but there was so much going on. You must have tfillin for my second son, Chabad tfillin, made of the best quality, just like I bought for my oldest."

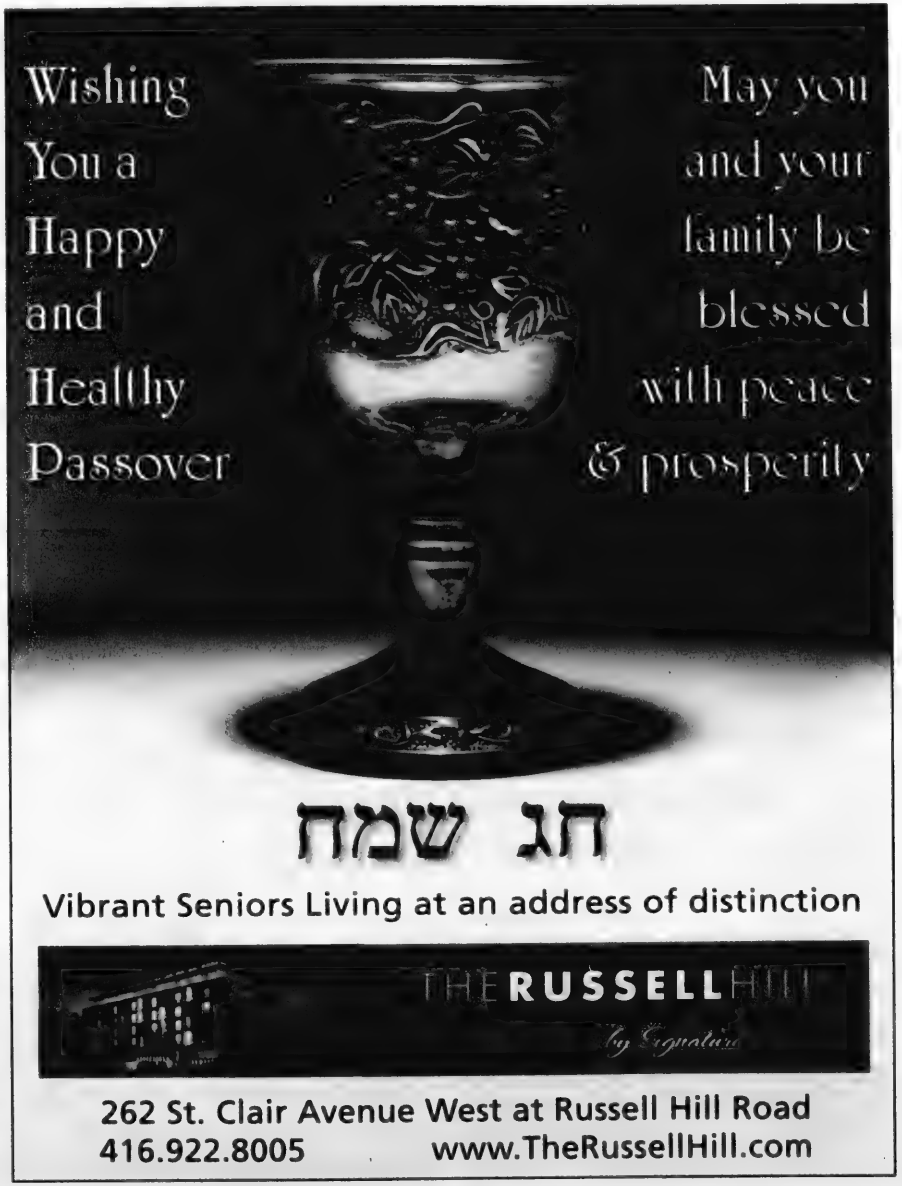
"Mrs. Knecht, I wish I could, truly I do. Let me see, let me see." With his right hand pulling on his red beard, the scribe's eyes scanned the highest shelves of his cavernous kingdom. He looked from one end of the room to the other. The lines above his nose, right between his eyebrows, deepened with frustration.

After a full minute, he gave a sudden chuckle of delight; focusing on a corner ledge that held a new looking pair. "Mrs. Knecht," he cried, "I think you may be in luck." He pointed a large finger towards the dust-covered shelf, "that pair, over there, is a very interesting pair. I would love to tell you who it belongs to, truly I would, but I have no idea! Let me explain. About six months ago, a gentleman walked in here and ordered a pair of the best Chabad tfillin that I could make. I told him the price and he agreed. He wrote his name and phone number on a little piece of paper and instructed me to call when the tfillin would be ready. Then he left. I have not seen him since. I have attempted to call the number many times but it is unlisted. I have asked around and no one has ever heard of him. It has all been very mysterious. So the tfillin have been taking up space on that shelf. I had all but forgotten about them. I am tempted to sell them to you. They are exactly what you ordered for your first bar mitzvah. What should I do?"

Neither of them spoke for a few minutes.

"I tell you what, Mrs. Knecht, if they are not picked up in a week...they are yours. What do you say?"

Her eyes filled. God had been protecting her all along. He had sent an angel - perhaps even Elijah the prophet - to order the tfillin in advance. Her son's dignity and commitment had been preserved.



My First Love

By Rose Romberg

Ku-ker-e-koo, crowed the rooster for the third time, like the final call of reveille. His outstretched wings flapped furiously, the reverberating sound diminishing gradually like a last drum roll.

It was Saturday! Ruth bounded off her straw mattress in the loft and climbed eagerly down the ladder. She tiptoed over the earthen floor, quietly placed a chair under the window, and climbed on it to look out. It was not yet daylight. But it was Shabbat. She was going to meet Lazar!

Down below, on the front lawn, she could barely make out the long tables covered with white oilcloth which she had helped set up yesterday, in preparation for the engagement party. The flowers she had gathered in the field and placed in baskets began to take shape in the emerging sunlight.

Through the open window, the morning breeze gently brushed her face, carrying the scent of heather and the pungent odours of the barnyard.

Ruth was content to be at her grandparents' farm. She adored her bubbie. Bubbie was kind and gentle, just like Papa. Ruth missed him terribly. If only he hadn't gone away, she thought. America was so far away!

But at this moment, standing at the window, nothing else mattered. It was Shabbat and Lazar was coming! She had been waiting all week for this day. Why were Bubbie and Zaide still asleep? Especially today!

Ruth was bursting with excitement and anticipation. How could Tante Gitel lie in bed, still asleep? Ruth knew she was lazy. Had she not overheard Mamma say more than once that Tante Gitel was lazy? But on this day! Ruth was tempted to shake her awake. In a few hours they were to start the procession to meet Tante Gitel's groom for the very first time. Ruth knew he just had to be wonderful with a name like that. Papa's name was also Lazar.

Ruth narrowed her eyes, peering at a distant figure approaching the house, wearing a long dark skirt which fluttered in the morning breeze, a black shawl draped over her head and shoulders. Oh, she thought, it's Pani Krakkowni from the farm nearby. She always came on Shabbat to milk the cow and feed the chickens and, during the winter months, to light the fire. She was nice. She always brought along a jar of sauerkraut. Not even Bubbie could make it as good.

At that moment, Ruth heard Bubbie whisper to Zaide in Polish, "Look how the child is anxious. I wonder how long she's been standing at the window?" Ruth understood every word.

This morning everything seemed to take forever. Ruth was too excited to eat her favourite Shabbat breakfast of stewed apples and plums, cornbread and warm milk fresh from the cow.

Breakfast was finally over. Dressed in Shabbat finery, at last they were on their way.

Rut knew that it was a Jewish custom, passed down through the ages, that a bride and groom must be escorted ceremonially by their respective parents to their first official meeting. Legend had it that if this meeting took place on the Shabbat, it was a double blessing.

Ruth skipped though the fields of purple heather and golden buttercups, where the narrow Vistula flowed and the tall emerald reeds formed a border along the water's edge. Bubbie had taught Ruth how to braid a doll with those hardy leaves— her first doll.

The forest trail they were about to enter was where she and Bubbie walked almost daily during the summer, picking blueberries and mushrooms. Here Ruth had discovered tiny speckled eggs in a bird's nest. She had pirouetted joyfully, in harmony with the symphony of mysterious sounds and smells.

But today all Ruth could think of was meeting Lazar. She skipped along the wooded trail, running from one relative to another, tugging at their clothing. "How much longer?" over and over, she queried. Then she saw people in the distance. She squealed in delight and ran forward. When she was close, she jumped into Lazar's arms, almost knocking him down. He hugged and kissed her, his dark brown eyes shining with merriment. Oh how handsome he was! Ruth felt her heart would burst as her arms clung possessively around Lazar's neck.

In this way they walked along, his parents alongside, talking and laughing in a language not familiar. The only word Ruth understood was dziecko (child).

Gently Lazar pulled Ruth's arms away and set her down so that he could greet his bride. Ruth was consumed by a feeling of jealousy foreign to her. At that moment she hated Tante Gitel.

The two families greeted each other with blessings while Ruth clung to Lazar's knees. He picked her up and carried her in his arms as they walked, chatting happily until they reached the farmhouse where the invited guests and family members met in warm embrace, and pre-nuptial festivities began.

At the first opportunity, Ruth climbed onto Lazar's lap. She curled up, her thumb in her mouth, like the four-year-old she was. Safely cradled in his strong arms, she was thinking, when I grow up I will marry someone as handsome as Lazar.

Content she fell asleep.

for my bubi
it was called nishi
that space between her legs, perhaps a shortening of knish or did she mean nisht, no, not?

Yiddish, a language not spoken in our home, except for private parental parlance and then most rudimentary for parents Canadian born, a home with 'down there's'
and lettered abbreviations and thus, I was completely ignorant of those other words for my parts, peergeh and schmundie and certainly not a female dog's klafte nor even der mutteror, the mother place with strange masculine pronoun and yet, schmuck, that Yiddish word for male parts heard so often on television left my father shaking his head muttering "they think it just means fool"

we did not use that word in my home, nor even putz for a self-made fool alluding only to a small boy's shmeckel nor the diminutive petsele

those other words,
Yiddish words for every penis personality,
I learned much later, shvantz for male member or tail and the redoubtable schlong describing perhaps, an appendage,
a long snake
or a troublesome wife and yet I wonder was it just a phallic delight in linguistic adoption of those words or prudery

where dortn....
the adverbial there... still describes a woman's private parts

Where Could the Matzo Be?

By I.B. Iskov

In the middle of our seder with our whole family, someone hid the afikoman.
Where could the matzo be?

My little brother David asked the Four Questions memorably.
He too was also wondering
where could the matzo be?

I thought it was behind the desk or on the closet floor.
I looked in every bedroom and through every dresser drawer.

I tore the living room apart and searched quite frantically.
I even looked in the piano.
Where could the matzo be?

I hunted in the kitchen,
but it wasn't there at all.
I searched the dining room as well and up and down the hall.

It anyone can find it,
I'm sure it will be me.
We need it to end the seder.
Where could the matzo be?

Oh no! Little David has found it.
But where? He won't tell me.
When next year comes, I'll wonder
where could the matzo be?

Millions were annihilated in Auschwitz
In Ashdod their descendants are reborn.
Belzec is a graveyard
But the sons of Isaac have rebuilt an altar in Beersheba
Only the massacred inhabit Chelmno
In Haifa Har HaKarmel stands guard over the city.
While Majdanek is a nightmare
Metula breathes the air of a reborn nation.
Sobibor no longer exists
In Safed Jews can dream anew.
From Treblinka to Tiberias is a straight line
The ashes of the dead have fertilized the fields of the living.

Today I seem to have the face of a man I briefly stared at,
on a bus on Rehov King David in the fall of 1969.

I wear the same clothes, dark jacket, dark shirt, rough tan trousers, dust-scuffed brown boots.

The mirror shows me, grizzled, unkempt, stocky, stoic, almost seventy.

My face is the face my grandfather wore.
My parents, aunts and uncles swore the resemblance is uncanny. My history is clear.

I was one of Titus' captives marched through Rome in chains.
I collected all my things in a sack to flee from Ferdinand and Isabella along the Jew-choked roads.
I missed my fate in Kielce and Bialystock.
I hid in the forests by Kishinev.
Once, I was dazzled by Jabotinsky. I walked for days to hear him dream. I trusted history.
And then I spent the war in, and outlasted
Bergen Belsen,

I sit on a park bench and look into the faces of strangers as they pass and every once in a long while I recognize myself.
I have the face of a man I briefly stared at,
on a bus on Rehov King David in the fall of 1969.

We meet in a small place, a shtetl shul, beneath a tallis' embrace. There is a book in my hands, but I do not need it.
The text is a jail, behind its black bars the mind wanders, behind the music of the words, the meaning is obscure.
Some say the words themselves are prayer. Some say the emptiness behind them is the God who deigns to meet you there, dares you, some say, dares your heart, to be without its meaning, to come unrooted as a tree would give in to the wind, a leaf would float to the sea.

A Blessing in Disguise

By Sharon Yale

Sometimes the story goes like this:

Many years ago, in the village of Bobrovnic, (although some people say it happened in Piltsk, or possibly Garbatke) there lived a very poor widow who had one sickly child, a son. Somehow, the widow eked out a meagre living taking in sewing. It happened, during a very harsh winter, that the widow found herself one bitter afternoon with very little wood for the fire, one small measure of grain in the pantry, and only a few teaspoons of oil left. Oh, yes, and it was almost Shabbos.

What could she do? How would she feed her poor boy (who had a runny nose, and was tucked up in bed), not to mention herself? Just then, there was a resounding knock on the flimsy wooden door of her drafty cottage. Whoever could it be? There was only one way to find out, of course.

The widow fearfully opened the door, and a huge, icy blast blew into the already chilly room. A large figure in a tattered brown cloak stood there, shivering. It was an old, grey-bearded beggar who looked even poorer than the widow herself, as he huddled outside in the snow, a wooden staff in his hand.

"I've travelled all through Bobrovnic," he moaned, "and can find no one who will take me in over Shabbos. Please, missus, will you let me in?"

The widow hesitated only briefly. True, the stranger looked unappealing, but she had been taught to pity those less fortunate than she was (not that there were too many people who fell into that category in Bobrovnic). Still, perhaps a proviso was in order. "I will happily share what I have with you," she said, "but I have barely enough to feed my son and myself. I've got a handful of flour and a spoonful of oil, and only a few twigs of firewood left."

The bedraggled stranger had already elbowed his way inside, and was shutting the door against the wind before she had finished speaking. "You have plenty of firewood," he remarked, nodding at the blazing fire on the hearth. It was true. The fire had suddenly grown to a bright flame, and the cottage was starting to feel warmer already. The widow stared at it in surprise. In the meantime, the stranger had pulled up a stool in front of the fire and was warming his chapped hands.

"Why don't you make a nice challah for Shabbos?" he suggested, nodding at the kitchen.

Exasperated, the widow shook her head at him. "I just told you, we haven't much flour or oil. Barely enough for soup mandlen." The stranger just smiled encouragingly at her, and indicated the kitchen once more. The widow pulled out her pans and bowls, and with a sigh, opened the jar of flour. Strangely, there seemed to be more in there than she was expecting. Perhaps it was enough for some flatbread. She took a spoon to try scraping the last of the oil from the oil jar – but there was at least a cupful in the vessel! As she poured the flour into the bowl, she found there was more than enough for two large loaves.

Within the hour, the widow, her son and the beggar were able to sit down to a meal. What it lacked in variety, it made up for in quantity. And didn't the children of Israel live on manna alone for 40 years? It was good to go to sleep with a full belly, in a warm house, with the smell of fresh bread lingering in the air.

The old man spent Shabbos with the widow and her son. On Sunday morning, when the widow arose, the stranger was gone. On the stool by the fire were an old wooden chest and a note. The chest was filled with gold coins. The note said, "The owner of a kind heart is never poor. But a little money never hurts. Thanks for dinner. Elijah."

Okay, maybe there wasn't a note. But who else could perform such a miracle?

Now, the story I heard recently went like this:

(And I heard it from someone whose cousin wasn't there, but who knew a woman seated at a neighbouring table.) The Sisterhood at the shul was hosting a Shabbat Kiddush luncheon for people who had reserved by Tuesday (or at the very latest, Thursday afternoon. Okay, maybe there was still one spot left Friday morning, but that was really pushing it, and you shouldn't wait that long next time).

The Sisterhood president had done the seating arrangements, and even managed to fit in that annoying person who booked Friday morning. But wouldn't you know it, when everyone had taken their seats, there were still some no-shows, leaving empty chairs at some tables, including one right beside the president herself. She was checking her list to see who hadn't arrived, when an odd-looking man she didn't recognize wandered into the hall.

"Can I help you?" the president said to the stranger, scrutinizing him carefully. She knew most of the shul members, and she had definitely never seen this fellow before. He wasn't even dressed for shul – had he even been in the service that morning? He was wearing patched grey corduroy trousers belted loosely around his rotund middle, a blue and orange paisley button-down shirt and a faded woolen vest.

"I'm here for the lunch," he said, beaming at the president. His small brown eyes shone from behind round, wire-rimmed eyeglasses.

"Did you reserve in advance?" she asked.

"Oh, certainly," he assured her, nodding emphatically. The president knew this couldn't be true. She knew every last name on that list, even that pesky Friday reservation. Well, she would make sure she got this schnorer's name and would follow up after Shabbos. In the meantime, there was that empty chair at her table, and her friends were waiting for her. The lunch had been paid for by someone already, there was plenty of food, and she had been taught to be kind to those less fortunate than she was.

"Come with me," she sighed, and led him to her table. Her friends looked up with interest at the eccentric little man.

"Would you like to hear a funny joke?" he asked brightly, as soon as Kiddush and the motzi were finished.

The people at the table were a polite bunch, and they murmured their assent. He then proceeded to tell a very dull story that had no punchline. He followed that up by completely monopolizing the president's attention for the rest of the luncheon, asking many questions about the shul and the local Jewish community. The president became convinced that the stranger, who said she could call him Eli, was from out of town – possibly a sightseer out on a day pass from some Orthodox yeshiva (she formed this impression from the number of times he completed his sentences with "Baruch Hashem", not your typical conversational adjunct at a Conservative congregation).

The president tried to confirm her theory by direct questioning, with little success. "Do you live near the shul?" she asked. No, he did not.

"What do you do for a living?" He explained rather vaguely that he worked for a very large organization as a forecaster. She got the impression he had something to do with the stock market, or possibly a major Jewish charitable foundation that had fallen on hard times.

The president's friends were throwing her glances of sympathy for her captive state, but none of them was successful at diverting Eli's attention from her. To be honest, they were preoccupied with their own conversations, and didn't really try that hard. As soon as dessert was served and benching was completed, Eli thanked the president warmly, murmured something about hoping to see her next Passover, and slipped away.

A week after the luncheon, an envelope arrived at the shul office, addressed to "The Sisterhood President". Inside there was a lottery ticket, and a note. The note said, "The owner of a kind heart is never poor. But a little money never hurts. Thanks for lunch. Eli."

Of course, it wasn't a winning ticket. But then, the president didn't really need the money. Still, she felt quite touched by the gesture.

A Traditional Treasure

By Sheila Madan

Pesach;
Spring, the rebirth of a season and the perpetuity of life;
the evolving yet forever enduring existence of the Jewish people.

Our seder; humbled and grateful are we for this privilege, not to be taken for granted but to be embraced with awe, joy and love.

As we observe and appreciate the beauty and brilliance of our traditional seder table, we are able to clearly apperceive that it can never compete with the lustrous glow in a grandparents' eyes, brimming with tears, expressing loving pride and adoration as their grandchildren recite the "Four Questions".

We listen, with reverence to our adored "Zaida" at the head of the table dutifully and passionately retelling the story, reciting the familiar passages from the Haggadah; his concentration broken only by the sporadic clatter of an infant grandchild clanging a spoon playfully upon the tray of her highchair and the giggles of the older children impatiently waiting to find the cherished Afikoman. Eagerly we anticipate the repetitiousness and familiarity year after year as our children excitedly search for the Afikoman; we derive pleasure in their delight when the treasure is discovered and the youngest members of the family joyfully receive their reward.

As we nurture and rejuvenate these traditions time and time again, we truly comprehend deep in our heart and soul that riches cannot replace nor can words truly express the joy in our heart; the comfort of the soul and the aura of peace, closeness and continuity that surround and embrace the seder.

The seder shall forever be an eternal privilege to partake of; truly a treasure of our tradition to be cherished.

I Can't Cook?

By Alvin Abram

For more than two years, first as a friend and then as my finacé, Marilyn got her hooks into me by her cooking. She would serve tantalizing culinary dishes that smelled delicious, tasted exquisite and were a picture of edible perfection whenever I ate at her home.

My mother and future mother-in-law kept kosher kitchens. My mother was one of the original fast food chefs – if the food wasn't burned – it wasn't cooked. My future-mother-in-law on the other hand was a cook. She lauded her daughter's culinary accomplishments, saying, "Marilyn made this" or "Marilyn cooked that" and Marilyn would shyly look away and place the delicacy in front of me and leave without saying a word, to retrieve something else from the kitchen. I was in ecstasy – I was marrying a cook.

These meals all took place before we married. I stress the word, "before". When we married, we spent three glorious weeks in Florida and on the day of departure, prepared to return to a life of love and bliss. Marilyn appeared to have difficulty packing. Her face screwed up into a look of pain and tears dribbled down her cheeks. "Hey honey, don't cry. We had a great time and some day we'll come back." I put my arms around her and give her a hug, but Marilyn pulled away from me, covering her face with her hands. "Come on honey, it's time to go home, and I have to return to work. Everything will be fine."

"Don't be mad at me, Alvin," she said, her voice muffled by her hands.

"Why should I be mad? We had a great time." A feeling of trepidation came over me. "Why are you crying?"

"I don't want you to be mad at me when I tell you," she squeezed out from between her fingers and then after a few false starts, she blurted out: "I can't cook!"

"What!" I exclaimed, not understanding the statement.

Very softly, she repeated, "I can't cook. My mother always did the cooking and I got the credit. I can't cook. My mother never let me do anything."

It took a few minutes for the words to sink in. I loved her meals – that weren't her meals. "It's all right, Marilyn," I found myself saying. "We'll learn together," and from that moment on began the adventures of Marilyn learning how to cook and me trying to keep the food down.

We rented a walk-up apartment in a three-storey building on Wilson Avenue. We were furnishing the apartment and I was about to climb up a ladder to hang the drapes. It should be noted that I possess 10 thumbs and none of them function as a unit. For me to even consider hanging drapes is in itself a major mental undertaking that takes months of preparation and six or seven escape clauses so that I can change my mind. Marilyn was doing her bit and although I lacked co-ordination of my limbs, I consented to try – the key word is "try."

I climbed the ladder with exaggerated reluctance and faced my obstacle – the bar that the drapes hang from. As I made my first move towards the bar, Marilyn's voice exploded throughout the room in a tone of total exasperation. "It's not working! . . . It's not working!

"It's not working!"

"What's not working?" I asked glad not to have to challenge the bar.

"The hot dogs."

"What hot dogs?"

"These hot dogs."

"Just a minute, I'm coming down." I was glad to escape the bar and the ladder. I entered the kitchen to see Marilyn with her hands on her hips staring into a pot on the stove.

"The hot dogs are not cooking. There is something wrong with them," Marilyn said.

I moved closer and stared into the pot. "Marilyn. You can't boil hot dogs without water," I stated, pointing to two lonely hot dogs lying next to each other, naked and without water to cover them.

"A lot you know," she answered. "The box this pot came in clearly says that this container is a waterless pot."

I knew Marilyn was serious, so I just asked, "How do you make soup?"

"Tonight's dessert will be special," Marilyn said with unexpected enthusiasm. She beamed from ear to ear at whatever she had prepared.

"What did you make?" I asked, fearful of whatever she said.

"Jello," and went to the refrigerator and brought out a bowl of red Jello. I scooped out a large portion of the red, wiggly substance with my spoon and placed it onto my plate where it quivered.

"Looks like Jello," I said. With the caution of previous experiments, I carved a small piece from the quivering mass and slowly placed it into my mouth. "It's a bit stringy," I said as I chewed. "There's something wrong with it. It's supposed to dissolve in your mouth, not become chewing gum."

Our personal relationship took a dip.

A week later, Marilyn placed another container of yellow Jello in front of me. "Try this and tell me if it's any better," she said.

I scooped out a portion and plopped it into my mouth. "Same thing, Marilyn. There's skin on the top. Something is wrong. Did you follow the instructions on the package carefully?"

The room turned chilly as Marilyn gave me a hard stare. She went over to the cupboard and returned with an unopened box and pointed to the instructions. "That's what it says and that's what I did," she answered jabbing her finger into the instructions.

I read the instructions. "If you followed these instructions, then there shouldn't be any skin," I stated.

"I followed the instructions," she emphatically stated. A look of frustration replaced the hostility that was there.

"Show me what you did," I retaliated.

Marilyn brought out a bowl. Opened the package and poured the contents into the bowl.

"So far, so good," I chirped.

Picking up the bowl, Marilyn went over to the sink and opened the hot water tap and let the water run for a few minutes.

"What are you doing?" I asked already knowing the answer.

"I'm doing what the instructions say. Pour hot water and mix thoroughly."

I tried not to laugh as I explained the instructions.

A few months later, Marilyn perfected her Jello-making and showed me the instructions on the packages she had bought that day. The instructions had been changed from hot water to boiling water. She said she wrote the company a letter and told them what had happened.

There is nothing more definitive than someone hell-bent to prove that she is right when she is wrong. Marilyn decided to make a chocolate mousse. We were going to host a large party and the chocolate mousse would be her crowning achievement. To prepare for this auspicious event Marilyn made a chocolate mousse for the family and achieved success. She made another one, which surpassed her first and her tasters raved about her ability to turn powder into baking power.

However, the night before the big party, Marilyn prepared the ingredients and left it in the refrigerator overnight as on her previous preparations. Needless to say, the evening was a huge success. The time had arrived to lay out the dessert and Marilyn busily began decorating the dining room table with cakes, tortes, cookies, pies and her chocolate mousse. Our friends converged into the room and immediately filled their plates with samples of everything that was on the table. When the big spoon was put into the chocolate mousse – out came chocolate goo.

Marilyn was embarrassed.

The next day, Marilyn made another chocolate mousse to see if the results would be the same. It didn't make any difference to Marilyn that our friends had demolished the chocolate goo. That was not important. To Marilyn, perfection was all that counted and chocolate goo is not chocolate mousse. The results were another bowl of chocolate goo.

Frustrated? Definitely.

What went wrong? After checking over the recipe several times, nothing could account for the chocolate goo. She telephoned General Foods and related the story to the consumer division and asked if they could solve the mystery of the chocolate goo. They told her to make another mousse and bring it to the consumer department to show them what was happening. They would test the mousse and hopefully a remedy could be found.

Marilyn prepared another chocolate mousse and placed it in the refrigerator. The next day, she tested the chocolate mousse and declared it chocolate goo. She placed the huge goblet on the passenger seat of her car and with due diligence for her precious cargo drove slowly to the General Foods offices. She parked her car in a lot near the building, removed the chocolate goo and with the stares of everyone she passed, marched down the street carrying her precious cargo as if it were a rare and precious artifact. Needless to say the stares she received suggested that some thought they were witnessing some "looney tune" carrying what they interpret as an item best left in the bathroom where it belonged.

She entered the building feeling ridiculous and was considering changing her mind, but her stubbornness prevailed and she offered the exhibit to the consumers division representative for testing. Armed with several spoons, the chocolate goo was virtually attacked by those in the department. "Our research department will analyze the contents and get back to you shortly," was the decision.

Three days later a gentleman from the research department called re: "runny mousse" problem. Diagnosis: undercooking the chocolate pudding. Remedy: cook a little longer until rapid boiling occurs. Not only did they solve the problem, but they enjoyed the chocolate goo. Much to Marilyn's surprise, two days later, a large box was delivered to the house containing several of the General Foods products and a beautiful letter thanking Marilyn for the delicious mousse. This experience had a good mousse ending.

To tell you the truth I thought the chocolate goo was delicious.

It is impossible to forget the spaghetti with garlic dinner in which the garlic top opened and too much spilled onto the spaghetti. Marilyn chose to thoroughly mix the garlic into the spaghetti and served it to me. The result became a hot issue of discussion after I could regain my voice.

Needless to say the roast beef that had the same elasticity as bubble gum became a jaw breaker because it was impossible to swallow. The flavour seemed to last as long as you chewed, but it was not practical to digest.

Another time, eating kosher Chinese something-or-other, I pushed the cooked vegetables into my mouth that appeared to have died in the steamer while Marilyn watched. My agreement with her was that I would eat anything once, no matter how bad. If there wasn't an appreciable improvement the next time, I could refuse it. This was the first time. I ate – she didn't.

There were many horror stories to follow, but the upside is that now she is a gourmet cook. She can prepare meals equal to any good restaurants and has given her recipes to some. Her baking is as good as any fancy bakery and made to my tastes. The down-side is obvious. I gained weight.

The Four-tunate Son

By Harold Pupko

Every Passover, for too many years, Aliyah Oylem-Goylem asked herself the same four questions:

How did I allow myself to get into this mess?

What right does one moment have to change all of time?

Why is love so unreasonable?

How long can I keep the secret?

She resolved that this Passover would be different.

This year, she would free herself from those questions, and unburden herself of a weight that seemed heavier than all of the charoset ever produced in the history of mankind.

She decided to begin with the secret.

The rusted sign that welcomes people to the town of Farblondjetville says: "POPULATION, 1028".

What the sign doesn't say is: "JEWISH POPULATION, 2".

Aliyah was the only person in town aware of the two Jews, whose existence served in her mind as a microcosm of Jewish presence globally. Emmett, her six-year-old son, was blissfully oblivious to his matrilineal inheritance. Aliyah's over-protective maternal instincts had repeatedly blocked her from changing his world forever by exposing his Jewish status to him. However, the burden of responsibility that comes from carrying thousands of years of Jewish history pressured Aliyah into revealing the truth to Emmett. She was just not sure as to how to break it to him.

Sitting in the kitchen pondering her dilemma, she found inspiration in the dish rack.

"Ma nishtana ha-ladle hazeh", she chuckled to herself.

Weeks later, she was ready.

On a prematurely warm spring afternoon, Aliyah busied herself over the stove and created a storm of scents designed to pull her son into the kitchen upon his arrival home from school.

That moment arrived.

"What smells so good?" asked Emmett, as he bounced through the doorway.

Aliyah's instinct told her to respond with the word "freedom," but instead she stuck to her script.

"Dinosaur soup," she replied.

The look in Emmett's eyes told her all that she needed to know. Her son had fallen for the bait.

"Dinosaurs are extinct. There's no way we could be having dinosaur soup. Show me what you are talking about."

His mother smiled the smile of a gifted grifter. She walked over to the pot on the stove, plopped in the long ladle, and removed a strange and mysterious object from the pot.

"What is that?" he inquired.

"A matzah ball, my dear son."

As she returned the ball to the pot, Aliyah continued the lesson.

"In this pot of soup are matzah balls, created in honour of the story of Passover, or Pesach, as our ancestors the Jews call it in our native tongue."

Emmett couldn't contain his curiosity.

"What is the story of Passover?"

His mother was quick to reply.

"There are many stories of Passover. Please be more specific in your questioning."

Emmett scratched his head, hoping for some inspiration.

"OK, what do dinosaurs have to do with Passover?"

His mother seemed pleased, maybe too pleased.

"In the beginning, God created the Earth in six phases. Each of those phases lasted millions of years, but for the sake of our story, we will call each phase a day. On the morning of the sixth day, He created the dinosaurs, and let them roam freely over the planet. Magnificent beasts, they were a beauty to behold. God loved watching them, and in doing so lost all sense of time and self.

"The angels marveled at the variety, the simplicity and the power of the dinosaurs. However, later that day, they expressed concern to God about one of those creatures, the one they called the Tyrant King, known to you as Tyrannosaurus Rex.

"The angels' main job was to sing songs of praise affirming the Creator of All as King of the World.

"The Tyrant King was throwing them off key.

"They urged God to destroy T. Rex because it acted as a haughty imposter to the true King of the World.

"The Creator of All, however, was reluctant to destroy his handiwork, and deferred responding to their request.

"The angels, embittered by God's failure to immediately act upon their demand, ramped up their pleas and insisted that not just T. Rex, but all of the land-based dinosaurs be destroyed.

"The Almighty was saddened by the hardening of their position.

"God designed T. Rex to have the strongest bite of all of the creatures that He had ever created, but He soon discovered that the bite of angels was the most painful.

"Stuck between His love of the dinosaurs and His love by the angels, God fell into a state of T. Rex vex.

"As the day progressed, the urgency and intensity of the angelic chorus started to get on God's nerves. Overwhelmed by their relentless chatter, He finally agreed to their demand to trigger the mass extinction of the earthbound dinosaurs, but not before, unbeknownst to the angels, he secretly preserved the memory of his beloved T. Rex by embedding its DNA into the DNA of a flying dinosaur.

"And within that imperfect moment, the angels finally desisted from their cacophony of complaint.

"When silence re-emerged and God was able to once again think clearly, He regretted his decision, but realized that He could not renege on his promise to the angels.

"God asked himself four questions:

How did I allow myself to get into this mess?

What right does one moment have to change all of time?

Why is love so unreasonable?

How long can I keep the secret?

"At that moment, Metatron, chief scribe of Heaven, arose from his throne and addressed God:

'Kel Shaddai, shamor vezachor bedeeboor echad."

Emmett giggled at his mother's attempt to imitate Metatron with a deep and booming voice. She sounded like a televangelist speaking in tongues.

Aliyah continued channeling Metatron, but reverted back to English

'To answer Your questions, You must remember that You designed the world to contain healing forces. The All Knowing is protected from all You know by two such forces, forgetting and limited recall. That is why You created me as Your chief scribe, to help You remember to remember. If You check Your blueprint for the universe, You will see that the divine plan requires that you smash an asteroid into the Earth to destroy the land-based dinosaurs. Let me remind You that major collisions carry your creative fingerprints. Do You not remember how You crashed a celestial body into the Earth to create the moon? Can you not see the majestic mountains that You created through Your vision of colliding tectonic plates? Wake up Your imagination to remember Your ultimate plan: the creation of the only animal with the potential to imagine You.'

"God, having been reminded of His ultimate creative task, sighed a sigh, the force of which flung an asteroid towards the Earth. The era of the dinosaur ended with a collision between the celestial and the terrestrial, and with the shedding of a few divine tears. "

At that moment, Aliyah's mind drifted to contemplate the power of collisions to both create and to destroy. She remembered how her life path had collided out of the blue with that of her late husband's to create a blessed marriage. She briefly relived the horror of watching from the passenger seat as her husband's life was ended by a drunk driver. She recalled how, as a result of that impact, Emmett prematurely entered the world, and she reflected on how the arrival of her "little moon" brought a much-needed stability to her life, which was now permanently tilted on its axis. She paused to consider the whereabouts of the organs that her husband had donated as his final act of kindness.

Emmett's voice crashed into his mother's trance.

"What has this got to do with the Jews?" he asked.

His mother choked back a tear and tried to regain her composure.

"God remembered how He had forgotten his own plan, so He took Metatron's advice to guard his memory with a reminder, and envisioned the matzah ball for that purpose. God chose the Jewish people to be bearers in perpetuity of that reminder. We were given the responsibility to remind God every Passover of memory's paradoxical power to both enslave and to free. We do so by making and eating matzah balls. In order to more fully appreciate the lessons embedded in those balls, you have to understand how they are made.

"First, you have to understand that God loves the number four. The world only exists because of four forces dancing together in perfect harmony. Gravitational forces, electromagnetic forces, weak and strong forces all interact to create the only planet in the universe that can sustain life as we know it. Because of his love of four, God commanded that matzah ball be made of at least four ingredients.

"The first ingredient is finely ground matzah, which is the closest edible substance on Earth resembling the material that makes up the asteroid that is central to this story.

"The second ingredient is the egg of the chicken. When God destroyed the dinosaurs, he secretly embedded DNA from T. Rex into the DNA of the ancestors of the chicken. God is the Great Puzzle Maker, and one of His greatest pleasures is to share in the moments when humans solve the puzzles that He has weaved into the fabric of His creation. Imagine God's feelings of relief and joy when scientists like your father uncovered the secret connection between the humble chicken and the majestic T. Rex. It is only through the art of asking questions that the magical and the mystical can be uncovered. That is one of the key lessons of Passover.

"The third ingredient is carbonated water. This represents the carbon dioxide that fuels the breath of storytelling. That breath allows me to tell you the story of Passover the way your father would have told it. Even though he is physically absent, his presence can still be with us through the power of storytelling.

"Passover is all about the telling of stories. Stories of what once was, stories of what someday will be, and even stories of what never was but will always be. Stories of freedom lost and stories of freedom gained. An eternal haggadic process, where the same story is repeated annually, but with effort, heard differently, every year.

"The last ingredient is flavouring, the most important being the love that the cook puts into his or her work. This represents the love and respect that God expects each of us to demonstrate to all of His creations. That is why He commands us to love four times in our Bible. And within the quartet of verses containing the word ve'ahavta, you will find the essence of our people.

"So there you have it, the story of Passover, or more correctly, your first of many Passover stories to come."

Aliyah then sat her son at the table and presented him with a huge bowl of soup containing four enormous matzah balls.

Emmett eagerly pressed his spoon into a matzah ball, but surprisingly the matzah ball pressed back with an indescribable firmness.

Emmett swallowed his lesson with enthusiasm and quickly emptied the bowl's contents into his stomach.

Within moments, it felt as if he had swallowed an asteroid.

"I feel kind of funny," Emmett mildly moaned, soup dripping down his chin, as he turned to his mother for comfort.

"My dear son, what you are feeling is the full weight of Jewish history pressing from within. Welcome to the tribe."

"The tribe? Huh?" responded a somewhat bewildered young man.

"Judaism," answered Aliyah with a loving smile.

"Any questions?" she asked.

"Yes, I have four," chuckled Emmett, hoping that his intuitive response would relieve some of the tension that he had noted in his mother's face throughout the evening.

Aliyah felt her soul elevated by the response.

It appeared that she was raising the Wise Son.

She promised him that next year the matzah balls would be fluffy.

Her Caregiver's Ani Maamin

By Chana Perman

A melody floats through the air,
It is the song of Ani Maamin
I believe with complete faith in the coming of Moshiach (Messiah) and although he may tarry, nevertheless, I wait every day for him to come

The song whirls its way into the ears of one precious soul, Leah

Leah, confined to a wheelchair
Leah, unable to respond with words
Leah, whose loving husband stands by with tears in his eyes
Leah's caregiver is African-American
She knows the Hebrew words of the song perfectly, and sings with emotion

It is a moment that wraps itself around me
This is Leah's favorite song
Its tune haunting
I recall the heartbreaking tale
Of the Modzitzer Ani Maamin
Composed by Rabbi Azriel David Fastag on the train to Treblinka, Ultimately, making its way to the Modzitzer Rebbe in America
And here:
Leah, whose story I do not know
But whose song I hear
It was theirs
It is hers
And mine
This caregiver's Ani Maamin
About our caregiver, G-d in heaven,
I believe with complete faith in the coming of Moshiach
May it be speedily in our days

Untitled

By Molly Lerman

I stood before the Western Wall and cried
For all six million people who could not
I did not leave a message in the wall
But prayed for all the souls that God forgot

I placed my hand upon the wall
And I could feel the pain
How many times has this occurred...
Over and over again.

We are the chosen people
I often wonder why
Chosen by God almighty himself
Chosen to suffer and die.

Is there a lesson to be learned
For all the world to see?
Is it not time for peace on Earth
For all eternity?

I'll not return to the Western Wall
Until God shows the way
For intolerance and hatred to cease
Then I'll come back to pray.

It Will Never Be The Same

By Sheila Madan

Passover approaches,
Our hearts ache with loss,
Reflecting on our wonderful seders;
Our beautiful seders of the past;
Together we would read the Haggadah;
Now, this is but a cherished memory;
It will never be the same.

Our seders were special; she made it so,
And we will miss her;
Her loyalty and commitment;
Her strength and her love;
We will miss her warm smile; her gentle heart;
Our hearts broken and aching;
A chasm; a void never to be filled;
It will never be the same.

Although it is a different time now;
For she is no longer;
What we once had is with us no longer;
We must persevere; we shall gather around the seder table;
Together we will read the Haggadah;
We will; and we must;
She would want it so;
It will never be the same.

We shall persevere;
And our lives will go on;
Eternally intertwined with beautiful memories;
As we gather around the seder table;
And together read the Haggadah;
It will be beautiful and it will be good;
It will be good;
It will never be the same.

Garden Story

By Mark Gordon

How can this be?
In tears, like a cork floating on a welter of waves.
after reading that old garden story, kicked in the gut
by his disapproval, knowing that the curse means war without end.

Yet I am grateful for this upheaval in my bland flesh, convincing me that I am
something more than dust, more than a centipede hunting its ribbon of sun.

I have been drawn through the twin hoses of Adam's eye, and Eve's lamentations.

I know too that the sun has been tipped up-side-down for my drinking if I just edge my lips close to that fountain of light, drink deeply past the boots the night wears,
that have carried me,
murder-wearied, from the start.

Exodus in Tan

By Bruce Jacobs Davidovitch

Nothing fashions you younger than
Lying in the sub-tropical sun
On a February afternoon at Hallandale Beach
Chill long gone from the soles of your feet
Sun block crinkling in the folds of radiating skin

Nothing forges you older than
Lying in the sub-tropical sun
Watching wrinkled and leathery bodies warp
Ripen and lose elasticity submitting to Sagging pigment and rising melanoma

But alas, it feels so good
Each pore drenched in UV
More sedentary, complacent and less able to rise
And seek protective shade and sunblock
Warnings scream within a frying brain

A hundred dermatologists' voices ride in forbiddance
But denial comes easy as soft ocean breezes
Sussurate like Temptation's whisper
It's alright and one more golden
Baked, basted and broiled hour is all you ask
For that tan line is a bragging right
Evidence acknowledging neither burn nor blister
Like the Anglo/Irish/Scandinavian
But darkening as a meandering desert wandering
Semite of biblical times

The essence of our people's second homeland
That southern portion of the Floridian peninsula
What Torontonian, Montrealer, New Yorker or Chicagoan
Did not trek I-75 ahead of a wintry cold front
Like the greatest Moishe ahead of the forging waters

En route to a Promised Land

His Time

By Suzanne Reisler Litwin

The child takes a deep breath and then begins
To follow the silver pointer along the old page
And sing ancient scripture of life lessons and God's words
Now is his time.

Years have past of all his Grandmen
Who arrived at this day to read and become Greater men of our own, righteous and proud
Reading and learning of the better and true

But in the pew sits the Mother in tears
Overwhelmed with joy and pride of the son she carried
From this moment on he will become Among the learned men before him in steed

For her he is still the softest skinned child
Whom she held and rocked through days and nights
All the love and care she gave and gathered
All that she hopes for his dreams to be

Watching him through her blurred watered vision
She sees the son so playfully young
This release of child to adult strikes a deep cord
A maternal soul understands this childhood loss

And so the great men chant the new member of this pack
Mazel Tov is spoken with taps on his back
A pulling smile is stretched upon her cold wet face
Happiness is glowing within this holy place

Deep down Mother reflects on the baby that was
The youthful hopes and dreams of warmth and sweets
Now is the time that her bird must fly
Now is his time to leave childhood ties.

Now is his time...

Mount Sinai Morning Meditation

By Jennifer (Jinks) Hoffmann

Construction clamour nearby.
A siren on Bathurst Street.
A dog barks without cessation.
A neighbour mows the lawn;
his kid jumps on the trampoline.

Why then is there a silence so lush, so enveloping
I almost cannot breathe?

Perhaps in the silence
You are praying we remember we all stand at Sinai. Always.
Each of us only one letter, of the Torah,
written in this place, not that.

Perhaps in the silence
You are praying we do not try to change another's letter to be the same as ours, that we do not try to be in a different place in the Holy Book.

If we succeeded there would be no Torah.

Perhaps You are praying we know the silence is filled with Your love songs;
perhaps You are praying
we are drawn to reading and re-reading the original score.

Perhaps You are singing my name and asking me to remember that to say a person's name is to know them.

Water Music

By Dr. George Bernstein

Walking along the beach
In the dying of the light
I hear water music orchestrated

By a symphony of waves in Harmony with a chorale
Of music of the spheres

God's baton arcs
Across the universe
As He conducts

From his galactic podium

The War

She told me the village from which she came was so small, if a horse stood on Main its nose and its tail would stick out either end of town.
Still they came and burned the place down.

Alina Speaks

By Anita Lerek

Alina Szapocznikow Kallicz, Poland 1926 – 1973, Paris, France
Alina spent her teen years in the ghettos of Pabianice and Lodz, and in Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen. She helped her mother, a doctor, in hospitals at the various internment sites. She became a noted sculptor after the war. She contracted tuberculosis (infertility); then breast cancer to bone cancer, resulting in her death at 47. She was silent about her experiences in the Holocaust.

Alina Szapocznikow

Dear little stone, you are all I can touch right now. So sore.
When I hold you, I feel the stones in Pabianice, the gravel chips blowing in the wind with the coming cold. In the park I'd make heaps of stone, and bow down to you as if it was a holy place. Then I'd laugh and laugh, and run home to tell my tatoosh (father) about my newest silliness. He died so young.
Good for him. Spared the tragedy.

I laugh now – yes, still laugh – but only inside. Hurts too much to move.
Around me everyone is so serious about my dying. I'm used to it.
I've been dying, and with the dying always. Seeing the dying saved my life.
It's OK. Everything is so vulnerable and fragile, really dying a bit every minute.
I see that. I mold that, to live forever. What more do I need to say?
Talk, talk, everyone says, even my dear Piotr. They beg me with their eyes.
If I started to talk I would never stop crying. Useless. Only for the weaker ones.
I need to work even now. Push, push, push my pencil to draw the phases of the invisible.
To forget some things helps me remember others.
What do they want
So much to hear? Listen to my work.

Little stone, I have carried you since Pabianice. You feel so heavy now.
I . . . I . . . I . . . am pain. Is this just another pain, another small death that is my normal life, or is this something bigger? Small Bellies, Big Bellies.
How I used to climb onto my huge marble babies, and drill and hammer them to life. So much fun, the quarries, Italy, mountains and mountains of rock for me to control.

That was in 1968. Such a mania for life. New folds, new shapes, new materials, polyester resin, plastic foam, engine parts. The drive to grow life from my hands, imprint my body parts in fast hardening mass.
New times, old times. The old madness in Warsaw.
Feeling it encase me – Jid ("Jew").
Couldn't breath. Lost my studio on Brzozowa Street. Back home to Paris, more student riots. I feel myself dying. My breasts feel tender.
First no - the doctors say there's nothing there. Then on to Italy, to life, to the body's fullness. Keep playing, keep grieving.

Dear stone. I dream that my body is cut up, butchered. Mamooshka (mother) and I working at the Pabianice ghetto hospital. Feb 1942. Germans ordering medical examinations of all the Jews. Stamp faster and faster. "A" for the healthy and "B" for the old and sick.

B B A

I wake up dead.

Multiples all around me. I create a self-portrait with four growths of myself flying out of my head. Lumps, obsessing breasts, smooth delicate breasts with headless torso, locked in blackness; marble breasts tacked onto a chest topped with a yellow blob; and my delicate long-stemmed flower breast that lights up as a lamp. I feel ... I feel .... I check myself in to the hospital In Paris. Second no - they find nothing. Six shows in 1968. My smiles and works are everywhere. I have nothing to say to anyone.
Feel cold inside. I miss mamooshka. She'd know what to do.

On May 16, 1942, my 16th birthday, the sun cursed down on us Jews ejected from our Pabianice ghetto. Closed for good. Of the population of 9000 residents, we 3500 "A's" were transported by trucks to the nearby Lodz ghetto. The "B's" we never saw again. Those were monster times.
Imagine. I didn't talk to Miroslaw, my brother, for the whole day because he wouldn't let me go out that last night with my friends. Lodz, barbed wire prison with drooling sewage. Watching everything, just watching, at the Children's Hospital, watching the starving children, the dysentery, the typhus and the tuberculosis, seeing tatoosh coughing everywhere. No medication. Watching Germans raiding our hospital, rounding up all the young patients into trucks like sacks of potato, while in the fireless cold - uncookable potatoes rotted away. Strangers, diseased body parts, amputated lives. Horror and youth. I want to live so much, I write in my little yellow book. I seek out dark bushes, nature's skin on my skin, on boy's skin. I trace lines in his wounds, imagining the embrace of security for a moment. Around me life is slipping, undoing. To touch your perfection, dear stone, to be your hardness, to remember our fiery ancestry.

They say my figures are becoming less steady, unsupported, mutilated, wobbly bandaged mummies, dismembered legs, gashed hands, headlessness.
My Goldfinger sculpture, horrible, some say, showing thigh stumps with a car part clamping down the crotch.

January 19, 1969, on the third try, I receive my cancer diagnosis.

My future is always worse than the hell I leave behind.
Out of Lodz. Time and trains, a blur. I am a body rolling on noisy tracks. The train's skin is my skin, lashed by storms and strip heat. The dark quarters are blinding. I see only by touching. From boards to metal bars I stab through to patches of window pane. Too crowded to stand or lie down, I'm suspended in between.

Auschwitz ... Breslau ... Hannover were scream stops, nothing more. In the circle of mamooshka, I patted her lips and chest trying to make her coughing stop as we travelled farther and farther away from all we knew, swallowed up inside the German belly, together.

Bergen-Belsen. A warehouse for the sick from other concentration camps.

We saw the heaping of bodies barely alive in the hospital and in the overflow tents.

We watched the inmates' organs exploding, losing limbs, losing blood, losing their lives.

Sometimes we had to give lethal injections to the very ill. Maybe better that way.

The evil eye of the Germans turned patient and caregiver to rock.

Dear stone, you had more feeling in you than me.

...

After the diagnosis, I am moved to commemoration. I wish to record my un-doing, step by step. By freezing each stage of my body's pain and dying, I preserve its memory and dignity.

Dear stone. I wrench you out of me, and place you with many others on the ground, as base for the objects that I have cast from my own face. My faces, my tumors, stuffed with my mementos -
I arrange them forever. To endure the trauma, and to put it out there,
I realize now, is to free the spirit.

Dear one. Enter my magical space. Seek out my pain, my light; and yours.
Feel the connection. Don't be afraid. My lips are still. Come listen to my work.

Sometimes We Must Disobey

By Maurice Krystal

We were unpacking suitcases in our hotel room when my wife announced she planned to get arrested two days from now. I looked at her face hoping to see a little smile or grin but instead I noticed the hard-set jaw and determined glare. She took out her tallit bag and laid it on the bed.

"So should I rush to support you or should I pretend I don't know you?" I asked.

"You're free to do what your conscience suggests."

"I think I'll play it safe," I said, "just so I can bail you out of jail. One of us has to act responsibly."

We both laughed as we continued to unpack.

After an eight-and-a-half-hour flight from Montreal to Ben-Gurion Airport, I was suffering from jet lag. I'm not a good traveller and didn't sleep a wink on the plane. Judith did, even snored lightly the way I am used to hearing her. This was our second honeymoon trip to Israel, 30 years after our first. We were in a fancy hotel near the Zion Gate in the Old City. There was a Jacuzzi and air conditioning in our suite. Thirty years ago we stayed in a bug infested youth hostel. What remained the same was that unexplainable feeling, that as soon as the wheels hit the tarmac, we were once again home.

Judith is a long time vegetarian and the next afternoon we went to an upscale buffet style restaurant on Jaffa Street. It is not my style of food but I often bend to accommodate her. I do so because I respect her idealism, whether it involves food or fighting for worthy causes. We belong to an egalitarian congregation and when we joined my wife didn't just dip her toe into the water, but dived in and learned how to chant the Torah up on the bimah. Her only regret was that her parents did not live long enough to see it. So when she joined Women of the Wall more than a year ago in their struggle for gender equality at Judaism's holiest site, it didn't seem far-fetched.

After selecting our "rabbit" food we found a table on the outdoor terrace next to two gentlemen involved in an animated discussion. It was mainly in English and from the accents it seemed that one was American and the other Israeli. The younger, a man in his 30s, referred to the other, probably in his 60s, as uncle. They were talking about the planned demonstration at the Wailing Wall tomorrow. We listened attentively.

"This is not a religious or an equality issue Uncle," the young man said waving his arms and adjusting his kippah. "This is really about politics. They want to bring down the government by embarrassing us on the world stage."

"How can a small group of women gathered around the Wailing Wall wearing religious paraphernalia bring down a government?"

"Most of these women are foreigners. They are left-wing radicals. They insult Jewish traditions. Unlike the Diaspora, most Israelis are Orthodox and prefer the status quo."

"Moishe, your father would not be happy to hear this talk, God rest his soul. He wanted Judaism to unify the country, not separate it into so many divisions."

I stared at Judith as we listened to their disagreement over a two-state solution, how to deal with Iran, if Obama really supports Israel, how to deal with the new Egyptian government, and who is even a Jew. As we walked out Judith turned to me and held my arm.

"So much going on in such a small country."

"Yes," I replied, "That's democracy."

The next morning was Shabbat and at 9 a.m.the sun was a glowing orange ball above Jerusalem. The narrow streets in the old quarter were filled with people, many taking photos with their phones as the two-dozen women with prayer shawls marched in a tight bunch around one woman holding a Torah. Tourists paused in their frantic search for trinkets and bargains to watch the strange procession pass by. Some were even clapping as they realized what was happening.

I was behind the entourage of the Women of the Wall as they approached the entrance to the Western Wall plaza. I kept a careful eye on Judith, but keeping pace with her had become increasingly difficult as the crowd thickened.

The huge sandstone blocks on the lower levels of the famous wall reflected a warm orange glow. The plaza was packed with people waiting for the conflict to begin. There had to be over a hundred police of both genders standing in line. They were assembled in the plaza some 50 feet away from the wall. Behind them was an even larger group of journalists with cameras and elongated lenses aimed at the women approaching like rifles ready to shoot.

For all its importance the length of the ancient wall is no more than half the size of an American football field, and maybe one third that in height. There are tunnels under the ground level that show that the wall has stones many hundreds of tons in weight. What is not seen, as is often the case, is more impressive than what is obvious.

Metal grills separated the plaza near the wall into a women's and men's section. Black -garbed haredi men on their side of the Kotel barrier screamed and shook their raised fists as the women entered the plaza. I did not understand all their words, but I heard the word kurve, which I knew was the Yiddish term for prostitute repeated a number of times. When some of them began hurling folding chairs over the barriers a number of the police rushed to keep them back.

One of the Women of the Wall began chanting the Shema and the female police contingent moved to stop the group's progress towards the wall. A female officer addressed the Torah-carrying contingent in English while another officer repeated the commands in Hebrew.

"You are under arrest for provocative action in a holy site."

"We will not stop," yelled the woman carrying the Torah. "I am a Jew, acting like a Jew, in a Jewish place."

Suddenly an order was barked out in Hebrew and the policewomen rushed the tallit-wearing women. I was caught in a crowd a dozen feet away. Two officers were trying to grab the blue and gold covered Torah but the woman holding it was refusing to give it up. Other officers grabbed her from behind, a melee ensued and I saw my wife's head grabbed in a headlock. Without thinking I rushed to her aid and pulled the arm of the officer who held her head. Suddenly I felt something hit the back of my head as the ground rushed up.

I was in a bed in a semi-dark room realizing someone was shaking and talking to me. I tried to get up but slumped back dizzy.

"Slowly sir," said a heavily accented male voice.

He held my arm and torso and slowly lifted me off the metal cot.

"Where am I?"

"You're in the Jerusalem central police station. You have been sleeping here for about two hours. Your wife is waiting for you on the other side."

He pointed to the end of the long room with some dozen beds against the wall, as we slowly walked towards a door.

Judith's frown quickly turned to a smile as I slowly approached with the officer holding me up. I sat next to her in a plastic chair in what looked like a waiting room. There was a buzz of many voices in many languages.

"Did I get clubbed?"

"Judo chopped. These Israeli female officers are well trained."

I felt the back of my head.

"Is anything broken?"

She shook her head.

"They were going to charge you with obstructing a police officer from carrying out their duty, but, when they found out you were only a protective husband, the charges were dropped."

The next day we were packing for a three-day visit to Eilat, to go snorkeling in the Red Sea. Judith had gone to settle the hotel bill and came back with a newspaper.

"Look at this, we made the front page."

"I'm not surprised, considering how many got arrested."

"That's not all. Netanyahu has asked Natan Sharansky to review the Wall's policy of not allowing women to pray with religious garb and he wants Sharansky to recommend changes."

She grinned and sat on the bed.

"So it was all worthwhile?" I asked.

"Religious principles don't change over night. There are two sides to every issue and in Israel, probably three sides. Nothing is simple, especially in this part of the world."

She looked at me.

"Was it worthwhile for you?" she asked.

I felt the back of my head.

"I'm quickly forgetting that it ever happened."

"Well, that's not good either."

Took the kids and took up with – to his mind –
A no-goodnik – he became Lubavitch

And bought himself a Harley-Davidson.
You can see him early summer mornings
After prayers, accentuating the contradictions:

His engine screaming down sleepy streets,
Martial helmet and sacred fringes,
Denim vest and sweep of patriarchal beard blown back

As if caught in a prophetic wind.

A Day in the Life at Baycrest

By Joseph Peretz

I awake with a jolt. I look at my alarm clock. It is 6 am.

I was dreaming of my army days, so long ago. A bugle call used to rouse us out of our sleep at six and we had to get up. At Baycrest we have the luxury of lingering in bed a few minutes longer. Wide-awake, the first thing I do is to open the window only to realize that I forgot to close it last night.

I get up, brush my teeth and shave unless, as it sometimes happens, the bathroom light goes off for a while. It is a good thing that I stopped using a straight razor. With an electric shaver you cannot cut your throat in the dark. Now, let's think for a minute. Is it Tuesday or is it Saturday, my shower days? If so I don't have to wash. I sit down, put the news on TV and think of the lucky lady who, today, will be able to admire my nonagenarian physique. I bet that the ladies are fighting amongst themselves so I can make their day!

The news seems to be the same each day. War here, fighting there, which leader of which country is still the leader. At least we don't have to worry about our prime minister who always seems to board or exit a plane travelling to the four corners of the world having nothing but our well being in mind!

Now comes the highlight of my day. I go to see my Baby. As I enter her room, she greets me with a smile big enough to make my heart melt. She sits in her comfortable chair, all dressed, as they would say in French, "Tire a quatre epingles," wearing a matching outfit, golden loops in her earlobes, lipstick, eyebrow liner and a new colour nail polish.

It reminds me of the "good old days" getting ready to go out to a party, maybe a birthday of a friend, now long gone like most of them.

She grabs my hand and pulls me down to kiss her and then she extends a finger for me to nibble on. It must have a certain meaning to her as if she tries to tell me something and then rubs her fingers across the night table back and forth. God only knows what goes through her mind or what is left of it.

Her eyes light up when I tell her that I love her and her smile gets bigger.

Dee, her caregiver looks on. I have to thank her for preparing my Baby for my matinal visit.

By now, it is time to go for breakfast. We walk together, each pushing our own walker. We enter the spacious dining room, park our vehicles and sit down so Dee can put on our bibs. What a breakfast!

She alternates between taking a bite of her banana and a slice of cheese. She was always a good eater and still is. A hardboiled egg is gone in no time, followed by a bowl of oatmeal, which she sometimes eats by herself or Dee feeds her spoon after spoon. My Baby, always a lady, whether she holds her juice glass, coffee cup or the little wine glass for Shabbat, still has her pinky extended.

Bit by bit other hungry people trickle in with walkers or wheelchairs. Zina, the kitchen lady to most of the caregivers, stops at our table to give Josie a hug and wish her good morning and make a show of admiring the colour of her nail polish which Dee changes every few days. My darling just sits there and smiles. I wonder what she is thinking but she seems to enjoy the attention very much. At least she still recognizes the people around her.

We finish breakfast and she eats her applesauce that she gets after every meal. Little does she know that it is mixed with her pulverized medication. She used to spit out some of her pills, get up and run out of the dining room (without her walker). At least now she ingests the medication and enjoys the applesauce.

At this time we return to her room where she sometimes has a nap on her bed or just dozes off in her armchair while I read the newspaper. I skim over the news, often boring and repetitious. I scan the obituaries and notice that unfortunately our once large circle of friends is dwindling down rapidly and the trips to Benjamin's Funeral Parlour are becoming more frequent.

I figure that at that rate there won't be anybody left to come to my funeral. So, I just decided not to die! It's worked until now!

When my darling wakes up and gets her snack it is time for our daily walk. Downstairs, we walk from bench to bench. I call it "benching." Benching is the Yiddish word for blessing over the lighting of the Shabbat candles or over the challah. So we walk every day "religiously."

Pretty soon it is lunchtime and we meander to the elevator and up to the dining room where I can see the menu of the day.

I never knew that there were so many kinds of chicken. To me a chicken is a chicken, but oh-no! I learned that there is boiled chicken, broiled chicken, breaded chicken, roasted chicken, barbecued chicken, lemon chicken, balsamic chicken. There is even Israeli chicken (probably born wearing a skull cap instead of the usual red crest). Some days we get chicken schnitzel, chicken salad and to top it off there are chicken wings or chicken liver. So you see that as long as there will be chickens, we certainly will not starve.

There are, of course, other delicious items on the daily menus such as lox or imitation crab served with croissants and Caesar salad. It is a concoction of white fish and it is "yummy" but I am puzzled. How does somebody in a kosher kitchen know what crab tastes like? Just talking about all that food is enough to gain weight.

After lunch we nap in our respective rooms. When my Baby wakes up and sees me, she takes my face between both hands and kisses me. Now out the door for another walk.

Here I have to say something about the cleaning staff. They do such a splendid job that you could literally eat off the floor. Yet I must admit that I never see anybody do it! They are pushing a cart with all their cleaning implements. In front of the cart, in big letters is the name "Royce Rolls".

Our walkers are only named Lexus. Could you not just plutz with envy? Weather permitting, we stroll in one of the little parks surrounding the building. In one of them there is a large bench with a plaque on it with both our names on it dedicated with love from our entire family. This does not mean that Josie will sit on it any longer than any other bench.

A few times a week we are treated to a concert in the beautiful Winter Garden. My love does not even stop to listen, she who used to love music, any kind of music, be it jazz, classical or opera. The only way to make her listen is to buy her a chocolate ice cream in the coffee shop. She would sit until the ice cream is finished, get up and continue walking. When I point out to her that some of the old people are dancing with their caregivers, it leaves her totally cold. We, who often won a prize just for being the first couple on the dance floor.

So we go benching some more which brings us to the quiet Garden Court with its glass roof, similar to the Winter Garden.

Tucked away in one corner is the quaint little museum that I remember from 10- 15 years ago after my memoir was published.

A copy of the book and some enlarged pictures of our wedding, the first chupah after the city was liberated, were on display as part of a Holocaust memorabilia exhibit.

Little did we think at that time that one day we both would be living at Baycrest.

Sometimes an "old timer" would sit at the shiny baby grand piano and tinkle sentimental songs from our time like If You Were The Only Girl In The World And I Was The Only Boy. Songs I used to play for my Baby on the big electronic organ she bought me for my birthday. Those Were The Days, My Friend. But they ended too soon.

We continue our walk back to the elevators. It is close to dinnertime, after which we return to my Baby's room where the caregiver and I watch the news on television.

My love does not show the slightest interest but she sits in her armchair and holds my arm tight as if she knows that I will soon be leaving. After the news, I tell my Baby that I am going home to sleep and promise her to come back in the morning and give her a big kiss. She looks at me with her big brown eyes and I can tell that she does not know what I am saying. She does not even wave good-bye and focuses her attention on the caregiver.

I go to my room next door and after more than six decades of sleeping in each other's arms, we are now separated by a flimsy partition between our two rooms. It may as well be the Berlin Wall.

I ponder what has become of our lives and I sit down and cry.

Wish all our families, friends & clients a very happy, healthy, peaceful and sweet Passover

Experience That Talks -- Solutions That Work

Where is She?

By I.B. Iskov

A young woman, half-smiling, stands in sepia tones, her light brown hair coiffed like Garbo's.

My mother, in her better memory, confessed:
This is my sister, Basha. She was my father's favourite.
Isn't she beautiful?

My sixteen-year- old brain racing,
I wondered why
my mother never told me about this other auntie, about her husband, my other uncle and their two daughters,
my other cousins.

I wondered why
I never got to visit them and why my mother's parents never mentioned this important person, their eldest and most attractive, intelligent daughter, all the years they lived in Canada
after the war.

I looked at my mother full of questions and asked only one:
Where is she?

My mother, wiping tears, blurted:
She was murdered by the Nazis with her husband and children.

Yellow and Pale

By Jan Csillag

I see a starchy cloth of white stretched with care on a long table.

Red ruby red glasses perch tightly squeezed on a shiny tray.

Light feathering down from candles making patterns in disarray on faces assembling this night.

A collection of pages is piled high like a fluffy nest ready to tell the story.

I see the gathering flock – our younger selves or some not here at all.

Little bird, yellow and pale,
you peck at my pane.

I don't blame you for lingering here.
Which missing soul stares and wants to share more time, more time?

My Zaidie, My Hero

By Janice Gutstadt

My zaidie was always my hero. I thought he was Superman, Batman and Mighty Mouse all rolled into one. He had a calming gentle power to turn my sadness into happiness. If I was in a fight with my brothers he would take my side unconditionally. I was the kleiner kind, the shaine madeleh. He would pick me up and hug me and I could smell the lingering cigar smoke on his suit and a faint smell of Crown Royal on his breath.

We all lived together in my grandparents' house, my mother, my father, two brothers and my bubbie and zaidie. My mother stayed there because she felt it was her duty to take care of her sick mother just as her own grandmother had taken care of all of us. My bubbie would get dizzy spells and fall down, so we all lived together until I was about ten.

My zaidie didn't look at all like Superman. In fact he was the antithesis. He was a small, wizened, balding man with sad grey eyes, a fringe of grey hair encircling his head like a backward crown and a hearty laugh. He was a man of few words. We sat at the arborite table in the big kitchen of that old house playing dominoes, card games and High–Q and he patiently taught me to count in Yiddish up to 100. He was a tailor by trade, a man who worked with his hands. He sat for hours on the weekend at his old treadle Singer sewing machine fixing clothes for people to make a little extra money for us. But it was his hands that interested me, long, thin, white fingers and large blue veins that erupted from the back of his hands. Once I pushed his vein down. "Zaida does that hurt?" I asked. He shook his head. I pointed to the blue tattoo on his arm. "Zaida does that hurt?" He touched his heart and answered, " It only hurts here sometimes when I think about the world." That was my zaidie.

He never had an easy life. He suffered a great loss during the Shoah, a young wife and small daughter, but we never talked about that.

When he moved to Canada after the war his friend at Tip Top Tailors made a shidduch, a match with him and my bubbie. The friend was married to my grandmother's sister, Aunty Tilly. We called her Yenta Tilleybenta, always interested in other people's business. They hoodwinked him, tricked him into marrying a sick woman who had spells all her life, because he was alone and longed for a family. When things got too bad in the house he went downstairs into the basement with his stash of cigars and Crown Royal flinging the words, "Dvora, a khalerye" into empty space.

Sometimes I followed him down to the basement. It was a dark musty place filled with old barrels, books, comics and his special box. The first time he showed me what was inside his box, I was awestruck. It was a fragile looking shofar, the colour of ivory, almost translucent, cracked in places and looked as if it would fall apart at any moment. The sunlight shone through the dusty basement window reflecting sparks of light on its surface. My grandfather had smuggled his shofar into Auschwitz and brought it out when he was liberated. It held some sort of magic for me. On Rosh Hashanah he brought it to our little shul and he produced clear strong sounds. No one could believe this tiny damaged man could fill the shul with the blast of "tekiah.". I sat in shul, proudly listening to him hoping one day he would teach me all the secrets of his shofar.

From the moment I began school I loved everything about it. The pretty perfumed teachers, the rainbow crayons, the thrill of learning to read and the acquisition of many new friends fascinated me. In class I was a quiet and shy little girl who rarely spoke or raised her hand even though in my mind I knew the answers to all the questions my teachers would pose. When I was called upon in class my face flushed a bright cherry red and I painfully stammered out the answer feeling everyone's eyes on my hot face. It was in my written work that I expressed myself, fluently and clearly, surprising my teachers who invariably made me their pet, a job that entailed wiping the blackboard or distributing test papers.

The first day of school in Grade Five was a shock. I was assigned to a class taught by a male teacher whose reputation preceded him. Mr. Skinner was a tall, muscular man with slicked back black hair and a strident voice. When our class became too noisy he slammed a textbook shut shouting, "Your heads should be in here." If someone's penmanship was not perfect, they would have to rewrite the passage many times on the blackboard in front of the whole class until he released them.

One boy who was disabled and limped suddenly became ill in class and threw up on the floor beside his desk. Mr. Skinner stopped the class, focused a steely gaze on him and shouted, "Get some paper towels from the back and clean up that mess now." I can still see that small boy limping back and forth to the paper towel dispenser, tears streaming down his face, crouching down to wipe up the smelly, slick mess. We all sat there silently, small and powerless mesmerized and terrified by the scene. Our hands were folded obediently, innocently on our wooden desks, bodies tensed with dread listening only to the sound of a small foot dragging along the wooden floor.

Mr. Skinner had a knack for uncovering and exposing a student's weakness like a wolf trailing a sick or damaged deer. With one flash of his eyes in your direction he took you down in an instant. One student on the first day of school stuttered out his name, "JJJJJJohn FFFFFasciannno." Every day he made John stand up and recite a poem we had learned the night before. He stood there sweating, painfully spitting out stammering words between long pauses until he was exhausted and allowed to take his seat in a cloud of shame and anxiety .We didn't look at John and pretended that the incident never happened, thanking our lucky stars that it was not one of us under his scrutiny.

Mr. Skinner had his own unique view of the world and peppered his lessons with strange stories and anecdotes. He was very animated and excited especially when he was teaching us about the Second World War. One day he blurted out that the Holocaust was a hoax, a big lie, and a Jewish conspiracy. It never happened. Everyone was silent, although more than half of my class was Jewish and some were the children and grandchildren of survivors. My head ached and my faced burned a bright red. Slowly I stood up and said, " That's not true. My grandfather was in Auschwitz. He has a number tattooed on his arm." I sank back into my desk and put my head on my arms.

All the air in the class seemed to be sucked out of the room and I had trouble breathing. I felt a shadow looming over me. I heard Mr. Skinner say, "Remain after class."

In public school we all went home for lunch. We looked forward to the break and the comfort of home cooked meals, hot soup, grilled cheese sandwiches and our mothers' welcoming smiles. The smell of soup simmering on the stove or chicken roasting in the oven for dinner was irresistible. At lunchtime I looked for Mr. Skinner but he had disappeared. After waiting for what seemed to be an hour I decided to go home because I knew my mother would be waiting and worried. It was wintertime and the day was very cold and snowy. I went to my cubby in the cloakroom to put on my jacket and mittens and boots. My mother had printed my name in big black bold letters on the inside of my boots to make it easier for me to find them. They were missing. In an instant I knew that Mr. Skinner had hidden or taken my boots, a coward's revenge on a little girl who had the nerve to stand up to him in front of the students. I had no choice but to walk home in my stocking feet. I tramped through the big snowdrifts in the schoolyard, my white socks becoming brown and frozen as I trudged along the slushy sidewalk to my house. When I got home my socks were soaking wet and I was shaking, my teeth chattering uncontrollably. Tears had frozen on my cheeks.

My mother carefully undressed me like a fragile doll and wrapped me in a big blanket. I had no words. I was unable to speak until my grandfather came to sit with me. He looked at me with his knowing grey eyes and I could feel myself melting, thawing out. The story bubbled out of me. I said, " Mr. Skinner hid my boots on purpose. He is cruel and meant to us. He is a bully and a coward. He told us there was no Holocaust."

My zaidie didn't say a word. I saw him go down to the basement and return with the box containing the shofar. After eating a bowl of hot soup, we both got dressed in our winter clothes armed with the old shofar in its box and the two of us started off for school hand in hand. We were almost the same height but I could feel him squeezing my mittened hand hard and sense the growing determination in each step that he took.

When we reached the classroom my zaidie entered the room quietly. Every eye was focused on this frail looking diminutive man. He removed the shofar from the box. The light reflected golden sparks from its surface. It look so brittle and delicate and for a moment I was afraid that my grandfather might not be able to produce any sound from it, that it would crumble in his hands. He put the shofar to his lips and let out one shattering, achingly beautiful and loud blast. The sound was deafening, like the cries of thousands of children, like the lone cry of his small, lost daughter. Mr. Skinher covered his ears and sank to the ground. The class erupted in wild clapping and stamping of feet. Somewhere I heard the sound of windows shattering and of walls crumbling. In between the piercing shofar blasts I heard laughter, my laughter, a soft tinkling sound like a tiny bell. It was the sound of hope.

Jerusalem Fragments

By Yonatan Curry

In the instant that the explosion happened there was an immediate quietness coupled with a bright light which had a coolness to it. "That's strange" he thought. After that everything went black.

Michael Burger had been sitting in the afternoon sun on a dry grassy patch with his back resting on the warm stones of the walls which surround the Old City of Jerusalem. Intermittantly nodding off he had thought this was an idyllic way to pass a sunny afternoon in Jerusalem. He would not have been surprised to see King David walking by as he was only a few yards from the entrance to his tomb and any one who could write those Psalms would surely venture forth into the warm Jerusalem sun to appreciate such a day.

As his sleepy frame gradually sagged lower against the wall his fingers scratched the dirt and began to casually play with a small piece of metal just below the surface. He had to bend his arm around a large bolder and it was this action which probably saved his life.

When he awoke in a cool bright hospital room the following day he immediately sensed something was missing. He did not feel complete. He could not quite put his finger on it, but something was missing. In making a mental inventory of his body he realized that his right hand was no longer there. But where was it ? Also why was he not in pain or bothered by this startling fact.

He remembered it had been there when he worked on the computer yesterday morning, but after that there were no actions to serve as markers for his missing hand. "Oh well, someone will be by to tell me what's happening," he thought. Then he drifted off to sleep again.

Little could he know that the place he had chosen to sit down on was the favourite hiding spot of Chana Levy when she played the game of hide and seek with her best friend, Yoav Yishai. Most days after school would find them out together roaming the streets and alleyways of the Old City looking for adventure.

Bound by matching superior intellects and their childish love of excitement they always found something new and of interest.

This was in spite of, or maybe because of, their mothers' admonitions to "be careful and keep out of danger." At 12 such cautions had an all encompassing aspect to them which meant they could be acknowledged and then safely discarded.

On sunny afternoons they would venture out beyond the Old City walls and engage in a glorious game of hide and seek. Chana was inordinately proud of,the fact that Yoav had never located her hiding spot which afforded her a warm dry location that had the added advantage of commanding a panoramic sweep of the lay of the land. It was while she was crouched here that Chana's fingers dug in the dirt and first encountered the small metal object that Michael's fingers also discovered on that fateful day a few days later.

Getting bored with not being found and noting that the sun was setting she scurried back to "home base" just a few minutes before Yoav.

Sitting in their school classroom several days later, they along with the rest of their classmates heard the explosion triggered by Michael's exploring fingers. But, being too young to think of any terrorist raison d'etre they assumed it was the result of work on one of the highways or building sites which seemed to be an ever increasing fact of the Jerusalem landscape.

Even after discovering the source of the explosion later that afternnon after school got out and the havoc it had wrought on her perfect hiding spot; it still did not dawn on Chana that her life had been spared.

Neither Michael nor Chana could know that this particular remnant of the First World War had remained in its quiet hiding spot since being buried by Ottoman soldiers in 1916. Some 20 years later it had almost been "found" by Sgt. Warren of The Royal Engineers who upon passing his metal detector over it encountered a strong beeping signal. But upon digging in the dirt a fraction of an inch near the mine he uncovered a metal bottle cap and decided to lower the sensitivity range on his metal detector just as his fellow officer, Cpt. Mattingly, bellowed out " let's get a move on or the beer in the mess will be all gone." Muttering to himself as he changed the setting on his meter he hurried away from the wall to rejoin his unit.

As Michael slowly took in the doctor's words his first thoughts were that it was a pity that it had been his right hand as he would now have to learn how to do everything with his left! He also wondered if he would look 'peculiar' to people when he swam in the pool at his JCC back home in Canada. He decided that these were quite childish worries and that instead he should be thankful that his vision had not been affected. Better still was the realization that but for his actions the mine might just as easily have been triggered by one of the many children he often saw playing around that spot.

The fact that they never found much of his hand was in many ways fine by him as he found it comforting to know that a part of him would forever lie scattered amongst the stones and soil of this holy city. His mother had cut her hand in a fall as a child and a stone had become imbedded under her skin. A fact which made her quite proud later in life as she was able to say that she always carried a bit of England with her wherever she went. He on the other hand (a terrible pun) could say that a part of him was forever anchored in Jerusalem.

What neither Michael nor Chana, nor Yoav for that matter, could possibly realize in those days was that in accidently saving her life Michael had permitted Chana to grow to womanhood. Attending Hebrew University and then The Technion, she would became a doctor and after marrying Yoav, her childhood friend and fellow doctor at the Institute of Medical Research Israel Canada (IMRIC) Chana would give birth to a son, Dovid, who like his parents, would become a medical reasearcher.

It was given to Dovid Yishai the intellectual beam of divine insight to discover the cure for cancer. Not that it was a great mental leap, but rather a simple thought; that perhaps if ultrasonic vibrations could trigger viruses into life, they might also be made to adversely impact cancerous cells. This led to the chain of research resulting in the rather simple method of curing all cancers, which in turn gave rise to those ubiquitous ultrasonic booths which are to be found in all medical centres around the world, where for a few dollars and a few minutes of one's time, people young and old, rich or poor could rid their bodies of what had once been the scourge of cancer.

But even as all this lay in the not too distant future, Michael feeling strangely at peace with the world and his place in it, dozed in his hospital bed.

Far away at the Palo Alto Observatory in California astronomers had just that day detected a sudden string of unusual nebula explosions curving along the edge of the universe. In a rather un-scientific moment, this phenomena they decided looked for all the world, like a contented smile.

And the divine will of Hashem thought so too.

Yahrzeit

For Fay Straining

By Ally Fleming

I light a candle whose flame is a soul's brightness, her inner light reaching up to God.
I light a candle because it is generous, as she was, with warmth and radiance.
I light a candle because love feeds us as wax feeds the wick, and we grew out of her love.
I light a candle because we have all walked in darkness and yearned for illumination.
I light a candle to feel her presence, to remember her voice, her hands on my shoulders.
I light a candle because her daughters are my mothers, because I am from her, and she is in me.
The candle is beeswax and bright and sweet. We are two flames burning together.

The Chanukah Flame

By Anne Duchowny

The dancing flames of the chanukiyah candles flickering bright
Their reflection in the window illuminating the night

I sit and ponder as I watch each candle glow
About the miracle wrought a millennium ago

Oh Chanukah, Oh Chanukah, what a delight
To watch your candles brighten up the night

Exodus

By Brandon Marlon

Exodus I: Gone from Goshen

Ours was a world of rills and lakelets, marshes and bulrushes, tributaries yielding to the Nile as we surrendered to overseers who cracked the lash and struck the rod.
We were in thralldom then, wet with sweat, moiling for a pharaoh only seen from afar;
though we attuned ears to the riverine environs,
we were gyved to a land deaf to our slavery;
desperate suffering cried out on our behalf,
our every sigh an orison, our every breath an oblation, until in time all we heard were the gasps of Godful hearts.

Moses' osses stirred the lifeless, prying us from the ambit of godlings and worldlings;
women skittered, men loped, children capered.
We moved as sheeple, pursued by harriers, the hopeful among us floating, the fearful trembling on the border of the grave.
But with the guidance of our herder (may his sleep be sweet), and by the pillared arms of the Almighty, we unfastened fetters and cried our relief, singing salvation along liberation's road,
the immortal hymnody of a nation in formation.

Exodus II: Betrothal

Do you remember our devotion when once we were young?

How, as a bride, we adored you;
how we followed you through the desert, through a land not sown?

Rebellious and stiff-necked,
we overcame even ourselves for your sake, weaving through perils, living on dole, engraving your thin silence upon the granite of our hearts.

Recollect us at our best, when our bodies were sore scratched by bramble, scorched by wasteland blaze, urged onward by faith in your will.

We swooned and stumbled and rose again on behalf of your name alone.

We were unforgettable then.

Keep us in mind…and your memories of us fresh.

Exodus III: Engaging Destiny

Expelled from the homeland, sacred and promised, thrust amid foreigners more hostile than hospitable,
we wandered and cowered before majorities, mingling without merging,
reading daily the obituary of our people in the glaring eyes of wishful antagonists.

For millennia in exile, aloof meant intact;
clad in gabardines, gartels, and shtreimels, burning the midnight oil in cellars and garrets,
we immersed ourselves in spiritual realms, lamenting fate's infelicities, pleading for the imminence of the Messiah.

Now restored to sovereignty, let us abrade the Diaspora with its fusty sackcloth and ashes, renewing our vocation, cherishing the challenge, rekindling the firelight of Israel to warm the nations of the world and melt the idols of the age.

Lost Jews

By April Laufer

Hegaditi l'chem hayom ki avod t'oveydoon…
I tell you today that you will surely be lost…Devarim 30:18

She closed the book. She did not have the energy to read about the unfairness of the world toward Israel and the Jews. Not that she didn't agree with some of the comments. Not that she didn't wonder the very same questions.

Her friend Bluma had recommended the book, Je m'accuse by Shifra Stein, the title a parody on Emile Zola's J'accuse that pointed to the injustices of the Dreyfus Affair. "She's dead on," Bluma exclaimed, her voice pitched high and adamant. "The answer to the Jewish problem is a stronger army in Israel. It is a waste of time trying to negotiate with Israel's enemies because they will never accept a Jewish state." Stein accused Israel of not doing enough. Of not being tough enough. "We Jews are too liberal, too soft hearted and we have only ourselves to blame for our continued victimization," Stein had written. In a somewhat elliptical comment Stein said that it was time for Israel to move on.

Yes, she understood the feelings. Especially when she thought of her family in Israel and how much they had to endure. The uncertainty of daily life, the rocket attacks, the constant vigilance. Yet, they never had any doubt about their decision to move to Israel. Israel wasn't just an address. Israel was home.

Once a year she and Max made the trip. How ironic she thought to herself. In Canada she always worried about the day-to-day events in Israel and how her children and her friends' children were managing. It was curious that whenever she arrived in Israel, the worry of terrorists, and suicide bombers and rockets, actually receded from her mind.

In Israel they were always busy with the grandchildren and visiting friends, and visits to places new and old. There was just so much to do in Israel. In Israel she knew what was happening. Watching people's faces, noticing how people behaved, she knew.

And then after a visit, that was always too short, they were back in Canada. No, she wouldn't leave Canada; her other three children were here. Still, she understood the irony that living in Israel with enemies on all fronts was the only place where a Jew could feel secure.

Things seemed unsettled for her whenever she returned from a visit to Israel. Reading about anti-Jewish sentiments throughout the world she remarked to her husband Max, how ominous and tiresome she found the constant barrage against Israel. With an unerring calmness he replied, "Just words." "But don't you worry?" she would press. "People who hate always get in the news," he replied. 'There are people who stand by Israel too." "Who?" she challenged. "France's new president said that France will always stand by Israel." "Where did you read that?" she retorted. "Right here," and he pointed to the article in the Jewish paper that he was reading. "Well," she harrumphed, "I didn't see that as a headline in the national paper."

Max who was always reading newspapers, told her to stop reading the paper if it made her depressed. And she tried, but then she felt this overwhelming need to know, to be aware of what was happening even if the news did so often crush her.

Perhaps, Max understood things that she never could. He was a child of survivors after all. Perhaps, that gave him some special knowledge. Some meme of consciousness that made him know that this was the fate of being a Jew, always the victim/survivor.

She wondered about all the anger directed at Israel and Jews. Perhaps, Stein was right. Jews were disliked simply because they were Jews. And what would happen if there were no more Jews? Would there be this longing for them? Oh – if only the Jews were here, then we would have someone to blame?

She heard the mail being dropped in the mailbox at her front door. Maybe there would be something interesting in the mail to take her mind off of the news. Maybe a card from her niece who was somewhere in Africa in her job with Doctors without Borders.

She brought the mail into the kitchen. Bills. Bills. Real Estate. Aah, the shule bulletin. She opened the envelope and looked at the last page. Nachas and Potpourri. An interesting language pairing, Yiddish and French. She glanced down the list of names with a smile. Ah yes, weddings, engagements. Thank G-d there were occasions for celebrations.

She flipped back through the rest of the shule bulletin, and noticed the bolded headline announcing the upcoming lecture: "Lost Jews." She didn't read beyond the heading but stood there thinking. Something about the title resonated in her.

She was about to read the details of the program when she was interrupted by a phone call. To her quiet hello her youngest daughter enthused, "Hi mom you're not busy are you?" Her daughter did not wait for a response but steamrolled on with, "I'm desperate to get to the gym today and the babysitter just cancelled. Can you PLEASE watch Ethan and Maya? It'll just be a couple of hours. I can be there in about 15 minutes. Please mom."

To which there was only one answer. "Of course."

She hastily threw the bulletin on top of the morning's papers placing them carefully away. She would finish reading the bulletin later.

When the grandchildren arrived a few minutes later, she felt happy. She planned to make chocolate chip cookies with them, read some stories and she actually looked forward to the million toys that would be strewn throughout the house. It was the perfect distraction from everything that was bothering her.

Later when she watched them leaving and being bundled into the car she wondered what did the world hold for them? Before she realized it she found herself thinking about "Lost Jews."

Wasn't "lost" a kind of wandering? Like being lost in the desert. Or not knowing where you are going.

She sighed. Lost. As in not found. Or like the Jews in the Diaspora still traveling in a miasma of not quite having arrived, never quite belonging.

Didn't that description fit Jews everywhere? Even Israel, 60 years old, had not quite arrived, not quite been accepted on the world stage? Last week it was stories about European and even North American universities boycotting Israeli academic institutions and academia.

Should the Jews not share their research then?

This week some Canadian aboriginal leader said Jews were like a disease. Where did such comments come from? Why?

Picking up a few things in her local plaza, she walked by a man with a long beard and yarmulke asking another man with a similarly long beard and yarmulke, "Where do you daven?" She walked on and did not hear the man's response and so let herself muse that everyone was looking for lost Jews.

Something about that exchange caused her to wonder how Jews were not all united in beliefs or politics; about how even within the Jewish faith religious views sometimes separate community rather than bringing them together. Are we lost from one another as well? She pondered.

She had known exactly what the man had meant when he asked his question; still it did seem a curious coincidence in her week of angst over Lost Jews that she would have overhead that very question.

Later as she put away her groceries she glanced at the day's newspaper headlines. Canada would not attend the next UN World Conference against Racism. Closing her pantry cupboard she remembered the stories of the Conference in Durban in 2001. The conference had focused almost exclusively on Israel. Even countries that had committed genocide against "other" ethnic groups had not faced censure.

She wondered if all that negative press, the pillorying of Jewish lobby groups having too much influence; the Holocaust deniers; the anger towards Israel; wouldn't that make someone wish to be lost so that he could not be so easily found and vilified?

Wasn't that one of the themes of the Jews in the Diaspora? Let's not be different so we can be the same; so we can be lost in the crowd.

And then there was the comment that one of her grandsons had let slip. If only Israel wasn't around, maybe people would stop blaming the Jews for everything.

She had been shocked by his comment and then sad. When she was growing up she had believed that the creation of Israel meant that Jews would no longer be lost or wandering. She still believed that Israel was "our" being found but she understood the difficulties that her university grandson faced. He was constantly confronted with anti-Israel posters and protests. He had to duck as he walked through the main university hall, which inevitably had someone handing out pamphlets proclaiming apartheid in Israel or worse.

A bewildering time.

"I'm going to a lecture," she announced to her husband. "Oh? What?" he asked raising his head from his favourite Jewish newspaper. "Lost Jews," she answered as she picked up her purse and checked that she had her car keys. "Oh," he said, as he continued reading the article in the paper, "B'nai Menashe." "What?" she asked with surprise. "What did you say?" "B'nai Menashe," he repeated, "the lost Jews of India."

She was standing in the hall on her way to the front door. "Oh right," she said. "Right. The Lost Jews of India."

Somewhere in the back of her mind she had known this. Now she realized that she had seized the words 'Lost Jews' as a metaphor for her sense of alarm over the state of the world.

She remained stalled in the front hall.

She put the keys back in their place, shrugged off her coat and went and sat down opposite her husband. "Not going?" her husband asked looking at her over his reading glasses. "I'll make us a tea," he offered.

She looked at the newspaper and opened the first page. She saw that some state had announced that it was making a contest for the best editorial cartoon satirizing the Holocaust.

She closed her eyes with a weary sigh. In the background she heard Max getting the teacups from the cupboard. The kettle was starting to boil. Lost, she thought, we are most definitely lost. Then as Max placed the teacup in front of her gently touching her shoulder as he did so, she suddenly had a different thought. If something was lost, didn't that mean that it still might be found?

Canada Post Publication Agreement #40010691

Israeli President Shimon Peres is interviewed by Turkish media at his residence on March 24 about relations between Israel and Turkey. The interview was given two days after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's apology by phone to Turkey's prime minister. Since the call, a measure of frost has returned to relations between the two countries. Please see related story on page 28. (Flash 90 photo)

Turkey's ambassador to Canada hails reconciliation with Israel

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Turkey's ambassador to Canada, Tuncay Babali, has hailed the announcement that Turkey and Israel intend to normalize diplomatic relations after an increasingly acrimonious three-year dispute.

"It will definitely be beneficial for both countries, as well as for the peace and stability of [our] ever-more volatile region," Babali said in an interview last week. "It will also give [us] an opportunity to further diversify and deepen our relations."

Babali made his comment to The CJN just days after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu formally apologized for an Israeli commando raid on a Turkish ship in May 2010. The raid claimed the lives of nine pro-Palestinian Turkish political activists trying to break Israel's naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, controlled by a Hamas government since 2007.

Exclusive

In the aftermath of the incident, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan demanded an apology, compensation and the lifting of Israel's siege of Gaza. Israeli and Turkish diplomats tried, but failed, to resolve the issue in direct talks.

As a result of the impasse, Turkey expelled Israel's ambassador in Ankara after withdrawing its own ambassador in Tel Aviv and downgraded bilateral relations to the level of second secretary.

The crisis was defused on March 22 as U.S. President Barack Obama was leaving Israel after a state visit. Obama, who had publicly urged Israel and Turkey to end their increasingly acrimonious dispute, brokered the rapprochement by placing a phone call to Erdogan and putting Netanyahu on the line.

Netanyahu, in a 20-minute conversation with Erdogan, expressed regret for the "unintentional" loss of lives and injuries."

Shoah education still key for CMHR

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite complaints from some quarters, Holocaust education remains an important focal point of the still-in-development Canadian Museum for Human Rights (CMHR).

According to an internal working document released recently to the media by the museum's board, a display on the Holocaust will fill a 4,500-square-foot space, making it the facility's largest stand-alone gallery after its Canada's Journey gallery.

As outlined in the working document, the Examining the Holocaust gallery is intended to be a case study in the "systematic destruction of human rights."

"The lessons of the Holocaust demand that we be vigilant," the working paper states.

The gallery will feature photos and graphic panels, videos, text and small, open drawers containing "fragile or secret documents." Among the exhibits will be an overview of Lemkin's Techniques of Genocide, a touch-screen panel that explains eight "techniques" that the Nazis used to try to destroy the Jewish People.

The outer structure of the $350-million-plus museum was completed late last year. The museum is expected to open to the public in 2014.

Canada's Journey, the largest gallery at 9,500 square feet, will consider past historical wrongs such as the internment of Japanese people during World War II, the Chinese head tax, residential schools for native peoples and modern issues such as same-sex marriage and disability rights.

Other galleries include an aboriginal section, human rights today and taking action in defence of human rights.

The Holodomor, the Soviet Union's forced starvation of hundreds of thousands of Ukrainian farmers – estimates of the number of dead run from 1.8 to 12 million – in the 1930s, will be examined in a film that will be part of a gallery called Breaking the Silence.

The gallery would "recognize the role of Diaspora communities and Parliament in breaking the silence" on five genocides – the Armenian genocide, the Holodomor, the Holocaust and, more recently, Rwanda and Srebenica.

The status of the Holodomor relative to the Holocaust among the museum's educational programs has been the main bone of contention from critics of the museum, and from one group in particular, the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association, which has been pushing for the Holodomor to be given equal space with the Holocaust in the museum.

"We have the support of most Ukrainain Canadian organizations, which are working with us," said Maureen Fitzhenry, the museum's media relations manager.

"They seem to understand what we are trying to do and appreciate our efforts to incorporate information about the Holodomor."

Fitzhenry noted that the working document is not an exhaustive list of every component and story of every gallery.

"The document is not a good way to assess what might be missing from the museum, although some are using it in that way," she said. "We have actually redacted some of the specific lists of stories being considered because they are not yet solid enough to release publicly."

She added: "The goal of the document is to ensure that museum programs are completely aligned with the galleries and built exhibits. Both components [exhibits and interpretive programs] are a very important part of the visitor experience in an 'ideas museum.'"

Israeli teen goes missing in Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A 16-year-old boy from Eilat, Israel, in Toronto as part of a reciprocal visit to the Jewish community, left the group without permission and, on the eve of Passover, remained unaccounted for.

York Regional Police have been asked to investigate, and friends on his social network back home, as well as members of the Toronto Jewish community, are being asked to tell him to contact his family as soon as possible.

"At this point, we don't know where he is," said Tali Aronsky, a spokesperson for the Jewish Agency for Israel. "Our priority is to locate him and make sure he's okay."

The Ethiopian-born youth, Raphael, was in Toronto as part of the Diller Teen Fellows Program, a Jewish leadership initiative that includes a visit to an overseas Jewish community where the visitors meet and interact with other Diller Teen Fellows. It is run under the auspices of Jewish Agency, in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other communities in North America and Israel.

Brian Keshen, UJA's vice-president of community capacity building, said, "We are still looking to find him and have contact with him."

The Israeli Consulate has been informed of the missing teen and they are spreading the word among expatriate Israelis that he is in Toronto on his own, said Keshen, who supervises the Diller program in Toronto.

According to Aronsky, prior to the group's arrival in Toronto on March 14, the teen had asked for permission to leave the group and spend time with friends. He was told that this was "not an option," Aronsky said.

Last Wednesday, while visiting the Vaughan Mills shopping centre in York Region with a couple of members of the group, the boy went to the washroom. "He gave them the slip" and disappeared with nothing more than his laptop and some cash, Aronsky said.

Mall security was informed, but a search did not turn up anything. York police were then contacted.

Aronsky said the teen later contacted organizers and his family in Israel to let them know he'd left the group but that he planned to make the flight back to Israel on Sunday. He did not.

Prior to his going missing, there was no indication he'd leave on his own. "He was bright and engaging, very involved in the workshops and discussions," Aronsky said.

The teen "had been part of travel groups on behalf of the Eilat community before," Keshen said. "He'd been recommended by his teachers and school."

Jewish Agency staff is in contact with the youth's parents, but as of Monday at noon, there was no indication his parents would file a missing person complaint.

The last word his parents received from their son was that he was with a friend in Toronto, Keshen said.

The youth left without his passport or luggage. "We want to make sure he's safe and aware of the support that's available," Keshen added.

An impressive visit

By any measurement, the three-day visit, from March 20 to 22, by U.S. President Barack Obama to Israel was a stunning political success.

It is true, as many experienced observers have noted, that the measure of the president's trip will ultimately be proved only by deeds and not by words. But there is no denying the psychological and emotional basis of the personal relationship between Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appears to have been altered for the better. If indeed it has, this can only be to the advantage of all parties concerned.

A cursory look at only a handful of highlights of the three-day presidential tour conveys a sense of the positive energy that the visit created.

• After The CJN of March 28 went to press, news of the rapprochement between Israel and Turkey broke across the airwaves and wire services.

Netanyahu spoke on the phone with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and apologized for what Netanyahu said were "operational errors" during the raid in 2010 on the Turkish ship, Mavi Marmara, that was part of a Gaza-bound flotilla.

Netanyahu's office said, "The prime minister made it clear that the tragic results regarding the Mavi Marmara were unintentional and that Israel expresses regret over injuries and loss of life. In light of the Israeli investigation into the incident, which pointed out several operational errors, Prime Minister Netanyahu apologized to the Turkish people for any errors that could have led to loss of life and agreed to complete the agreement on compensation."

The two leaders immediately agreed they would normalize relations between the countries. And Turkey said it would cease its efforts to sue the Israeli soldiers involved in the 2010 incident.

Many of the news reports concerning the apology, however, missed an important fact that Israel Radio reported (according to JTA): Obama initiated the phone call in Netanyahu's presence, spoke with Erdogan, and then handed the receiver to Netanyahu!

• On March 21, Obama travelled to Ramallah to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Abbas hoped to elicit a reiteration of the call for a settlement freeze that Obama made in 2009. But the American president refused to do so.

In fact, he retreated from the 2009 statement by implying that a settlement freeze should not be a precondition for negotiations.

"If the only way to begin the conversation is that we get everything right at the outset, then we're never going to get to the broader issue, which is how do we structure a state of Palestine and how do you provide Israel confidence about its security," Obama said.

The president's change of position was not lost on the Palestinians or the Israelis.

• During his joint press conference with Netanyahu, Obama made the following statement about Iran.

"We agree that a nuclear-armed Iran would be a threat to the region, a threat to the world, and potentially an existential threat to Israel. And we agree on our goal. We do not have a policy of containment when it comes to a nuclear Iran. Our policy is to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon. We prefer to resolve this diplomatically, and there's still time to do so," he said.

"Iran's leaders must understand, however, that they have to meet their international obligations. And, meanwhile, the international community will continue to increase the pressure on the Iranian government. The United States will continue to consult closely with Israel on next steps. And I will repeat – all options are on the table. We will do what is necessary to prevent Iran from getting the world's worst weapons."

Obama's words were quite categorical. "Our policy is to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon... All options are on the table."

It was clearly Obama's intention to win over the people of Israel, to dissipate suspicion by which a considerable number of Israelis had viewed him. He had set out to reset the relationship. His visits to the Shrine of the Book, prime minister's Yitzhak's Rabin's grave and Yad Vashem were intended to demonstrate symbolically and substantively that he understood and empathized with Israel's – the Jewish – claim to secure, sovereign existence in the Land of Israel.

Obama worked hard to impress the Israelis. As we know, Israelis are quite experienced with and even cynical about the ways of politicians. But most of the reports from Israeli media suggest that Israelis were impressed by Obama.

Time will tell if it was for the good. – MBD

THE LAGOVER SOCIETY

Throughout the late 1800s and into the post-World War II era, many different mutual benefit societies (landsmanshaft in Yiddish) were formed in Toronto by groups of Jewish immigrants who were often from the same town or region. They joined together to help one another establish new lives in Toronto. One such group was the Lagover Society, which was organized in 1931 and helped many early Toronto Jews by offering free loans, job assistance, and a sense of community. Pictured here are Lagover members at a committee banquet in 1947. Photos from many of the societies are on view on the recently installed Bridge of Hope at the Lipa Green Centre. (Ontario Jewish Archives photo)

Activists aim to preserve Kensington's character

Vicky Tobianah
Special to the CJN

Before Kensington Market in Toronto became the hip, vintage-shop, urban scene it is today, it was just a small area with a strong identity, which many immigrants, including Jews, called home.

Virtually every immigrant group that came to Toronto before the 1980s first planted their roots in this area, said Rosemary Donegan.

Donegan, a curator who focuses on art in relation to industrialization, was speaking about how Kensington Market and Spadina Avenue have changed over the years, at the inaugural event for the Kensington Market Historical Society, on March 20.

"It's a living street, it's changing all the time," said Donegan, about Spadina Avenue. These new immigrants were actively involved in the city's politics, she said, a reason why the street became known as "red Spadina."

Jewish life flourished on these streets, with Hebrew and Yiddish newspaper stands lining the sidewalk, although in those times they would arrive a day late from other major cities, said Donegan. The streets were filled with greengrocers, synagogues, a Yiddish theatre and kosher butchers. Although those are long gone, you can still see faded Hebrew letters on some of the buildings.

Kiever Synagogue in Kensington Market

It's estimated that 20,000 to 30,000 Jews lived in this area at one point, but most of the Jewish community had left by the 1950s. Today, only two synagogues remain: the Anshei Minsk Synagogue on St. Andrew Street, an Orthodox shul that still holds daily services, and the Kiever Synagogue on Bellevue Avenue.

"It was a village, an enclosed area," said Jean Cochrane, the author of the book Kensington. "It was a bubble. It was very much a cohesive neighbourhood. They're a strong community, and when they feel threatened, they mobilize."

That's still true today for Kensington Market locals like longtime resident Marion Kane, 66.

"When I moved there in 1978, there were live chickens on the sidewalk. It was mainly food shops, lots of Jewish merchants were still there at that time," said Kane. "Gradually, the Jewish merchants have nearly all gone. The European Quality Meats and Sausages [a butcher shop that had been there for more than five decades] closed last April. The whole feeling of the market has changed."

Kane is a member of the Friends of Kensington Market group, which aims to preserve the market's unique character. They stopped Starbucks from opening last year, and they're currently attempting to thwart Loblaws from opening a supermarket in the neighbourhood.

"A lot of the change is inevitable," said Kane, "but part of it is worrisome. There's a danger of it becoming gentrified, like another Yorkville. We need to preserve Kensington as a haven for small merchants."

Kensington looks vastly different than it did 50 years ago, when it was a place for low-income immigrants. Now, the market is much more upscale, with lots of bars and cafés and many vintage shops, and younger, hip residents, as Kane put it, who want to move in.

There are still some elements of the past that remain, such as the outdoor food market and its reputation for bringing food from every corner of the world on one street. It's these elements and many more that the Kensington Market Historical Society wants to preserve. "There's lot of interest in its history, and that's why we started it," said the society's president, Dennis Reid.

The residents who have been watching the area change hope that the society will still have a market to preserve in 10 years time.

"They're moving with the times, but in the process we don't want to lose everything that makes Kensington special in the name of the almighty dollar," said Kane, "like the outdoor street life, its cosmopolitan nature, the fun and flavour of the place. It would be painful to lose it."

Seeds of hope

We have just concluded our celebration of Pesach. At this very time 70 years ago, from the bunkers, apartments, balconies, alleyways and sewers of the ghetto in Warsaw, Jews were in the midst of their desperately courageous armed resistance against the Nazis.

The ghetto uprising actually began that year – 1943 – on the first night of Pesach, April 19. The Nazis rolled their tanks to the ghetto entrance intending to trample through and destroy the largest Jewish ghetto of Europe as a macabre birthday offering to their fuhrer, whose birthday was the following day.

But the starved, emaciated Jews resolved to fight.

As Prof. Dina Porat, Yad Vashem's chief historian, has written: "Along with members of the undergrounds, all of the surviving Jews in the ghetto resisted the enemy in order to defy their murderers, although they knew they had little chance of survival. These 50,000 Jews, left in the ghetto following mass death by disease and starvation and the deportation of 265,000 men, women and children to Treblinka, took to defence in the bunkers, and fought with utmost courage and resolve. They put up the bravest of resistance for almost a month, until they were brutally suppressed."

Indeed, the Jewish fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto resisted the Nazis longer than any of the armies of the countries of Europe conquered by the Nazis. Their resistance inspired others.

Remembering the defiance of the Jews of Warsaw will occupy a special place in our commemoration this year of Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah (Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Day).

But defiance and rebellion during the Holocaust took many forms. Porat succinctly, eloquently explains. "In the ghettos and camps, indeed in every place with a Jewish populace and Jewish life, there was some form of protest or resistance to the plot to obliterate the Jewish nation. From flight to hiding, mutual help efforts to educational and creative activities as well as the observance of Jewish rites – even with the scarcest of means and in the most unthinkable conditions – all these acts embodied the relentless struggle of Jewish individuals and communities to counteract the restrictions and dangers raining down upon them – and against all odds, sometimes, to live to see the day of victory."

The fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto harboured no hope that they could defeat the daily, unceasing onslaught of the relentlessly hateful Nazis. They knew their enemy too well.

They could not imagine, however, that their determination to fight back would ultimately become a universal symbol of bravery and heroism, or one of the inspiring evocations for the Jewish fighters five years hence fighting back against the onslaught of five Arab armies intent on destroying their tiny, nascent Jewish state.

Fittingly, the anthem of that tiny Jewish state is called The Hope.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres was re-elected unanimously as head of Israel's Labor party, thus becoming its candidate for prime minister. He was unopposed. In his acceptance speech, he spoke of the need to pursue peace.

Act of defiance preceded redemption

I am perplexed by the words of the late Rabbi David Hartman, as published in The CJN ("Passover: a fine-tuning of the human soul," March 21). He states that "Passover suggests a supernatural model of redemption... that positions us as passive and patient, waiting for an interventionist God to rescue us from our Galut realities." However, Rabbi Hartman overlooks that brave act of defiance that the Jewish People needed to undertake before they were redeemed! Before the last plague, the Jewish People were required to take a symbol of Egyptian belief, a lamb, which was viewed as a god, and roast it whole – outside, for everyone to see! If that was not enough, then they took the blood of this god and smeared it on the outside of their doors! They ate this lamb in a festive meal and ate it with matzah. We are taught that the requirement of freedom is to first reject the norms of the oppressors, and then we will have the moral strength for freedom. It's this meal that we re-enact at the seder – the night before we went out to physical freedom. In the Torah, the experience in Egypt is the rationale for many of our social justice commandments. It's not much of a challenge "to find underlying spiritual and ethical meanings beneath the surface of Passover." Rabbi Hartman states that Jews "can't stand order," but the festive meal at the beginning of Pesach, and the very name of our prayer book, means "order"! Yes, we needed revealed miracles at the birth of our people, at Pesach, but by the time we reach the end of the year, with Purim, we are taught to see God acting behind the scenes.

The Purim problem

Yossi Klein Halevi's Perspectives piece, "Pesach Jews vs. Purim Jews: the agony of our dilemma" (March 14), is about those who worry about Amalek, who attacked the weakest of the Israelites as they fled from Egypt, and those who worry about taking care of Palestinian strangers. But the Purim problem – the problem of Islamism, isn't only an Israeli problem. It's a problem that affects all western nations. Its effects on Israel should not be separated from its effects on other countries, and to do so, takes it out of context. Only when Islamist attacks on Israel are seen in a universal light can the ideas of peace or annexation be genuinely investigated.

IAW incorrectly minimized

David Koschitzky's guest voice, "IAW is really a non-event for students" (March 7), and its headline convey the wrong impression about Israeli Apartheid Week's significance and minimize its strategic importance to Israel's foes. Whether or not the IAW has been successful in attracting mainstream media coverage – Kotchitzky reports that it has not – it still remains the most universal and most recognized "calling card" of the multiple tactics used by those who would slander and vilify Israel on campus.

IAW's proliferation, combined with a lack of an aggressive response, can and probably does spawn and encourage the other campus activity that Kotchitzky deems important enough to warrant a response – the harassment and intimidation of Jewish students, the misuse of student governments to promote anti-Israel sentiments and professorial "abuse of the podium." Now the proverbial chickens have come home to roost in the form of a resolution passed by the York Federation of Students (YFS) on March 21 supporting the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign.

Jewish Federations of Canada says that serious efforts will be taken to reverse the trend that this resolution represents, not because the resolution has practical significance, but because the student body and Jewish organizations, all obliged to pay dues, were given little forewarning of the proposed resolution by their executive on a subject that he believes holds no real interest for the vast majority. How then did these guys get elected, one wonders?

I see this resolution as a followup to the recent IAW held at York University. Surely both are connected, with the lack of firm response to the one encouraging the other.

The doctor came by to visit the day before our mother left us. As her condition had declined dramatically in recent weeks, he was checking up on her with increased frequency. Sitting at her bedside opposite my sister Rochelle and me, the doctor asked our mother in his characteristically empathetic manner how she was feeling. She smiled, clasped his hand, and in a weak yet resolute voice responded: "My bags are packed."

Appearing to change the subject, she motioned toward the blue number tattooed on her forearm and explained, as she had done countless times in the past, that this was how the Nazis tagged Jewish prisoners kept alive for slave labour at the Auschwitz concentration camp. It was not just an efficient German administrative procedure, akin to ranchers branding their cattle to keep track of them – it was actually a deliberate attempt to dehumanize the Jews. By replacing the prisoners' names with numbers, the Germans were trying to steal their souls before killing their bodies. Of all her family members deported to that hellish place, she was the only one who survived to bear witness.

Robert Eli Rubinstein

Lest the good doctor misunderstand her intentions, our mother emphasized that she was not looking for pity. After the war, she had been blessed with a wonderful husband, children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. And Canada proved to be an excellent country in which to build a secure and fulfilling new life. No, the reason she drew attention to the tattoo on her forearm was something else.

Her horrific experiences at Auschwitz led her to ponder how it had been possible for humankind to sink to such depths of degradation, and how it might be possible to prevent a future recurrence. She concluded that the key was for people to acknowledge their common humanity.

We might have different colours of skin, hold divergent beliefs and do things in dissimilar ways, but deep down, in our heads and in our hearts, we are all essentially alike, children of the same Creator. Tragically, we have seen how distaste for others can transmute into raging genocidal hatred, even among citizens of the most advanced, civilized countries.

We must be ever vigilant in warning people about the grave dangers of intolerance and discrimination. This was the crucial lesson she had learned at Auschwitz, and she felt compelled to convey it to all who would listen.

And so it was that an elderly woman speaking heavily accented immigrant English who had never before addressed an audience, joined the Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre Speakers' Bureau.

Again and again, our mother was to employ her personal story of survival as the framework for delivering a universal plea for tolerance to diverse groups from all over southern Ontario, non-Jews as well as Jews. She derived particular satisfaction from engaging in dialogue with schoolchildren, to whom the future belonged, thousands of them over the years.

The gates of Auschwitz

In general, she found Canadian youngsters to be profoundly ignorant about the crimes perpetrated against the Jewish People during World War II. They were invariably shocked to realize that this lovely, refined lady and her family had been marked for death simply because they were Jews. This shock provided the opening to drive home her point about the pernicious consequences of intolerance.

'We are painfully aware that the ranks of the survivors are rapidly being depleted and it is just a matter of time before they are all gone. We who remain behind must prepare ourselves for a world in which there are no living witnesses to the calamitous destruction of European Jewry.'

The doctor sat silently for a moment, tears welling up in his eyes. The elderly patient's heartfelt words had resonated deeply within him. Dispensing with professional protocol, he told us that his own late father had served in the Pacific with the Canadian Armed Forces, ending up in a Japanese prisoner-of-war camp. The camp guards treated him with extreme cruelty and he bore the scars of this dreadful experience for the rest of his life, his family suffering along with him.

Right to the end, Judith Rubinstein was driven by an unwavering sense of mission. Her growing physical distress was not what preoccupied her. She had an important message to transmit to all mankind, including, of course, her doctor. But the universality of the message did not negate the unique particularity of the Jewish tragedy. No other people in history had ever been marked for total, utter annihilation. For my mother, the necessary response to the tragedy was a defiant affirmation of Jewish identity, which the enemy had been so determined to obliterate. Such an affirmation is manifested in living, loving devotion to the heritage of our ancestors, providing a legacy to be passed on to our progeny. This is more a matter of faithfulness than of faith, for regardless of the level of religious observance to which survivors eventually reverted, they could never escape a certain abiding skepticism regarding Hashgacha Pratit, Divine Providence.

At our mother's funeral two days after the doctor's final visit, I focused on what was then fresh in my consciousness, namely her fearless serenity in the face of death. A traumatized 24-year-old orphan emerging from Auschwitz could not have imagined that she would prevail to the venerable age of 92, living what would prove on balance to be an extraordinarily good life. For our mother, every single day after liberation had been a great blessing, but it was more than sufficient and she was not greedy.

Now it is time to turn our gaze to the future, which, we recognize with sorrow, will be devoid of Judith Rubinstein's potent presence.

We are painfully aware that the ranks of the survivors are rapidly being depleted and it is just a matter of time before they are all gone. We who remain behind must prepare ourselves for a world in which there are no living witnesses to the calamitous destruction of European Jewry. We have been spoiled all these years by having in our midst remarkable people like Judith Rubinstein. To be sure, they bore testimony with their tattooed forearms, resolutely refuting the scoundrels who deny the veracity of our people's tragedy; but in their successful struggle to rebuild normal, decent lives, they also gave us hope for the future of humanity.

Who will now guide us? Inspire us? Give us comfort?

We shall have no choice but to devise as best we can new ways, of necessity less direct and less compelling, to perpetuate the sacred charge of the survivors.

Let us pray that we are up to the challenge.

Robert Eli Rubinstein lives in Toronto. These remarks were delivered in February on the shloshim of Judith Rubinstein's death.

Israel and the lessons of the Holocaust

The first Crusade was proclaimed by Pope Urban II in 1095, sending thousands of men (and some women) east through German lands toward the "Holy Land," then under the rule of Muslims. Along the way, through the Rhineland and eastward, crusaders and townspeople massacred the Jews of these areas, leaving smouldering ghettos and mutilated bodies behind as they pressed forward to do God's will.

We know about some of these because we have memorbuchen, martyrologies written some years after the events of the Crusades, in which tales were recounted of the deaths by crusader sword. Sadly, many also died at the hands of fellow Jews who killed their families and died by their own hands rather than accept conversion.

The reverberations of those massacres were felt long after the soldiers had gone, leaving grieving survivors behind to rebuild and propelling thousands more into Poland and Russia, where they were more welcome, if still vulnerable.

In Spain, where Jews had lived for centuries in relative amity with both Christian and Muslim neighbours, the ascent of Isabella and Ferdinand spelled the end of Sepharad. The Jews of Spain were hustled out of the country or forced to convert, creating a migrant population of Sephardi Jews who, ironically, often found havens in both Catholic Italy and the Muslim Ottoman Empire.

The fate of Spanish Jewry led, as Gershom Sholem argued in his Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, to the development of a closely constructed mystical universe propagated in Safed.

We today live in the shadow of the greatest massacre in our people's history.

Every year, new facets of this catastrophe are revealed. Individual stories of survivors are legion. Shelves of research abound. Memorial services in our communities are annual events. Centres for the study of the Holocaust are dedicated to teaching the lessons of its inception, implementation and outcome: millions dead, whole populations destroyed and remnants scattered.

The themes of "Never again" and anti-racism are prominent.

Now a question: should we, dare we, claim that the State of Israel is one outcome of that enormity? Earlier catastrophes had no such outcome, nor would the idea of a Jewish state ever been contemplated by their survivors, short of the coming of the Messiah.

Yet there it is, deep inside us, the memory of the deepest horror of our age and the brightest accomplishment within the space of a few decades.

What are we to make of the 20th century, with these bookends to Jewish life, one blood-stained and the other seemingly redemptive?

Brushing aside those who deny the Holocaust or minimize its realities, we certainly should memorialize and teach it, or else what good can come of so much suffering? The memories of the survivors are precious, and we have done well to preserve them, as soon only their printed and recorded words will remain. Even in this, we are fortunate, as past tragedies have not had similar authorities.

But the "lessons of the Holocaust" must not be trivial. We have to teach that while some individual actions mattered for good, most people and governments, including our own, turned away or actively participated. And some individuals were both heroes and villains, a bit of each depending on the circumstance. There must be nuance in what we teach.

As for Israel, is it a miracle or a human-created opportunity? Surely, six million deaths don't lead inevitably to a Jewish state. The issue is fraught. However, we can take heart from the recent speech by new MK Ruth Calderon (a student of the late Rabbi David Hartman), whose love of state and Torah are manifest. Her vision sounds like a gift that can move Israel in a new and inclusive direction.

She aspires to "bring about a situation in which Torah study is the heritage of all Israel, in which the Torah is accessible to all who wish to study it, in which all citizens of Israel take part in Torah study as well as in military and civil service. Together we will build this home and avoid disappointment."

She longs for "a day when the state's resources are distributed fairly and equally to every Torah scholar, man or woman, based on the quality of their study, not on their communal affiliation."

Her "aspiration," as she calls it, brings hope of a brighter day, one that can make us worthy descendants of the lost communities of Europe.

Freedom for agunot

We have just observed Passover, our eight-day holiday of liberation. We celebrate our freedom from slavery at this time every year and use the holiday as our freedom apparatus.

Focusing on issues of liberty and independence helps the holiday establish its relevance. In the past, we have set the table with place settings for Soviet Jewry as well as for other special causes.

In a religious framework, we say that, as God saved us, we are obligated now to turn around and redeem others. For the most part, Jews have been attentive and even resourceful in following that imperative. In both the religious and the secular communities, we have seen incredible dedication to the redemption of Jews. In fact, there has been a growing establishment working toward the recovery and improvement of all humanity.

My grandson was on a mission this past summer with a group of Jewish teenagers who went to Africa to help orphans there. They went as Jews to help non-Jews.

But there are a group of Jews who are off the radar for most of us. These are women waiting for their get – their Jewish divorce. They are in an enigmatic state of being married but in a dead marriage. Unable to get on with their lives, they are held hostage by men who no longer love them and no longer provide for them. And Jewish law as applied by its representatives enables them to do so!

What are we to do?

I have challenged our community for many years. During those years, we successfully asked the Canadian legislature to walk with us and work out an amendment that would ease the imbalance. We can be proud Canadians, for we have a law that helps our agunot, our women deprived of a Jewish divorce. But for full justice to be applied, for the redemption that Passover demands, we need and expect an application from within Jewish law. Pressure can come only from within the Jewish community.

So, to begin with, while Passover is fresh in our minds, we should listen to the story of an Agunah.

Then let's ask our rabbis, local national and international: What are you doing to help this woman? Where are you in this matter?"

Recently, in one of our online discussion groups, our rabbis were insulted by the strident tone of the activists. In truth, the posting was angry and fed up with all rabbis at the wasted years during which so many women languished and so many useless marches were held.

High profile cases go on and on – here in Canada, in Washington D.C. and in Israel. What good does it do to put a man in jail? The women are still alone, living in poverty and bound by a dead marriage contract. Nothing has been done in the Orthodox world to end the systemic abuse of these women carried out in the name of Jewish law.

Many rabbis have worked on individual cases, have marched

Norma Baumel Joseph

and spent long hours trying to convince men to release these women. These are dedicated rabbis, the "good guys." And it is these men who reacted to our strident comments. But, while so many have worked tirelessly to help individual women, none has attacked the problem at its core.

The problem resides in the law. Listen carefully to what I am saying. There are solutions. (Not prenups. That is not a solution. No get has been given on the basis of a prenup.) I will write it again. There are solutions in Jewish law, systemic solutions. We have waited too long for rabbis of goodwill and strength to operationally apply those available to them.

Jewish law is based on classic principles and responsa precedents. It is complex, often confusing, and marvellously flexible within its own system and parameters. No body of legislators ever intended divorce law to imprison women within this horrible state that it has become. We call on our community to call upon their rabbis to do something systemic.

Yes, keep helping the individual, but also work toward building that solid block of rabbinic responsa and action that will legitimate final redemption of the system of divorce. While Passover's message of freedom is still fresh in our minds is a good time to begin to free the system of this plague.

Movies to savour at the Jewish Film Festival

The most outstanding Jewish cultural event in Toronto is undoubtedly the annual Jewish Film Festival. This year's edition, which runs from April 11 to 21, lives up to high expectations, judging by its cinematic offerings.

"I don't go to sleep easily, ever," confesses Shimon Peres, the president of Israel, in the documentary The Price of Kings: Shimon Peres, which will be screened on April 15 and 16.

At the ripe old age of 87, Peres, one of Israel's founding fathers, is still in the thick of things. Many of his contemporaries are either dead or confined to senior citizen's homes. But Peres, who has filled every top position in government, is still serving his country. "The most interesting thing in life is to work," he says.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last month, he was one of the first dignitaries to greet U.S. President Barack Obama upon his arrival in Israel for a visit. And a few days before, he formally accepted Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's new coalition government.

The portrait that Richard Symons and Joanna Natasegara draw of Peres in their 77-minute film is rich in nuance. Although he was never a soldier in the field, he was instrumental in acquiring the heavy weapons that the newly founded state required to win the 1948 war. Peres, as defence minister, permitted the construction of settlements in the West Bank. But as foreign minister and prime minister, he was something of a dove, pushing forward to make peace, even as Palestinian suicide bombings claimed countless victims.

"If you don't have a vision or a dream, you'll do nothing of importance," he tells an interviewer. True to this maxim, Peres has worked assiduously to secure Israel, as The Price of Kings suggests. Yet until quite recently, Peres, who hungers for popularity, was an under-appreciated figure in Israel. His bitter rivalry with Yitzhak Rabin was no secret, but they learned to work together to solve the pressing problems of the day.

Harry Hunkele's Back Door Channels: The Price of Peace (April 14 and 16) recounts in meticulous detail the frantic diplomacy that gave rise to the Camp David Accords in 1978 and Israel's peace treaty with Egypt in 1979.

When Egyptian President Anwar Sadat let it be known, in the wake of the Yom Kippur War, that he wanted to break the bloody stalemate with Israel, the United States got even more deeply involved in the Arab-Israeli conflict. American, Israeli and Egyptian diplomats used unofficial channels in Morocco, Romania and Austria to facilitate negotiations, which were kick started by Sadat's historic visit to Israel in 1977.

Hunkele claims that Ezer Weizman and Moshe Dayan, the Israeli defence and foreign ministers, and Jimmy Carter, the American president, drove the incipient peace process. Menachem Begin, Israel's prime minister was not as conciliatory. Indeed, his relations with Sadat were so bad at one juncture that Sadat threatened to pull out of the talks.

Key players who participated in these complex and interminable discussions add substance to this otherwise substantive and intriguing film.

Honorable Ambassador (April 12 and 15), directed by Jonathan Paz, focuses on the tireless efforts of an Israeli ambassador to bring the benefits of drip irrigation to Africa. Miki Arbel, the Israeli envoy in Cameroon, discovers to his chagrin that local farmers are not using the made-in-Israel technology to water their fields. An agronomist by training who loves Africa, he travels around the country to ascertain why they are resistant to modernity.

An affable, well-meaning fellow who likes chatting with his African driver, he meets "kings" in flowing robes, local officials and hard working women who till the soil while their lazy spouses lounge around indolently in cafes. And while he is treated with kindness and respect, he discovers that old ways die hard in a tradition bound country. In utter frustration, he calls his wife, informing her he is at his wit's end. But then something wonderful happens to vindicate his faith in the mission. Honorable Ambassador is by turns amusing and endearing.

Shimon Peres

Gideon Raff's Prisoners of War (April 14), the Israeli pilot movie that inspired the American television drama Homeland, is taut and riveting. Three Israeli prisoners-of-war are returning to Israel after 17 years of captivity in Lebanon. Their families are consumed by a mixture of joy and apprehension. Sadly, another Israeli POW, having died in Lebanon, will return in a coffin. The reunions are moving, but the POWs have been profoundly affected by their ordeal, and in one particularly poignant case, a wife cannot bring herself to admit that she gave up on him and remarried.

This is tender and powerful stuff.

Norman Mailer

The Other Son (April 15 and 17), directed by Lorraine Levy, pulls at the heartstrings. In 1991, as Iraqi Scud missiles crash into Haifa, nurses in a hospital hustle new-born babies into the safety of a bomb shelter. Two of the infants, a Palestinian Arab and an Israeli Jew, are accidentally misidentified after they're returned to their cribs. The parents are unaware that a mistake has been made.

Eighteen years later, DNA tests conclusively confirm the egregious error. What are the parents to do? How will the sons react? Can this potentially tragic separated-at-birth situation be rectified?

Levy handles these explosive emotions with immense tact and sensitivity, turning in a film that leaves a viewer at the edge of the seat.

Norman Mailer: The American (April 17), a biopic by Joseph Mantegna, delves boldly and flamboyantly into the life and times of the late, great American novelist. Mailer tapped into writing while studying engineering and catapulted to fame with his first novel, The Naked and the Dead, which was based on his experiences as a soldier in the Pacific theatre during World War II.

Twice a Pulitzer Prize winner, Mailer was a journalist and a political activist as well. Mantegna regards his subject as a "literary rock star" who had a finger on America's pulse. In one jaunty archival clip, he jousts playfully with Gore Vidal, who was no wallflower either.

A macho man in the mould of Ernest Hemingway who revelled in boxing, Mailer had six wives and nine children, all of whom appear in this absorbing film. Mailer, essentially, was a paradox. He was a companionable husband, but a philanderer whose infidelities condemned marriages. He was a devoted and supportive father, but self-absorbed in the extreme.

George Gedeon, in the probing documentary In the Presence of my Neighbours (April 21), skillfully examines the historic relationship between Greeks and Jews. He pays special attention to the Holocaust period, when Germany occupied Greece, and to contemporary Greek attitudes toward Jews, which are coloured to some extent by antisemitism.

A Greek Canadian journalist from an Orthodox Christian background, he delivers a remarkably balanced account, letting the chips fall where they may. By doing so, he performs a valuable service for both Greeks and Jews alike.

Survivor reminds students of courage and hope

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Marie Lardino, founder and principal of Voice Intermediate School expected that bringing Sally Eisner, a survivor of the Holocaust, as a guest to her school would have an impact on her students.

She wasn't prepared, however, for the impact her initiative would have on her personally.

Lardino thought it would be a "fantastic" idea to bring Eisner to the school – a small private school in Toronto's Distillery District as a follow-up to last year's Grade 7 and 8 trip to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

In November, Lardino met Eisner through a friend, and immediately felt a strong connection. The two women now speak virtually every day, and Lardino brought Eisner back to the school last month.

In a tribute to Eisner on her blog (http://marielardino.blogspot.ca) Lardino, nee Benitez, wrote of the resemblance in looks and loving manner between Eisner and her own aunt in Uruguay.

Eisner even ended conversations the same way as Lardino's aunt – "I love you, I love you, I love you," stressing the word "love."

Lardino, who attended Catholic school as a child in Uruguay and moved here when she was 12, only learned as an adult that she has Jewish ancestry.

Grade 8 students Philippe Blasi, centre, and Liam Mroueh reconnect with Holocaust survivor Sally Eisner on her second visit to the Voice Intermediate School.

She believes her Uruguayan-born grandmother, whose maiden name was Reiter, was Polish, although Lardino's great-grandparents were from Spain. Her grandmother used to use Yiddish words and light candles on Friday night, she recalls.

"For me, it always felt like something was missing," Lardino said.

For the 45 Grade 7 and 8 students at her school, meeting Eisner also had an impact.

The 90-year-old survivor, who grew up in the Polish town of Zaleszchyki, lost her parents in a labour camp when they were shot by Nazis and thrown into a mass grave, along with her future husband's parents. She was just a teenager at the time.

"I am not a bitter person," Eisner told The CJN. "I love people, and I'm not prejudiced."

Pam MacIsaac, the school's vice-principal, said the students were inspired by Eisner, and asked if they could do a followup project.

In early March, Lardino brought Eisner back to the school to see the artwork that the students had created as a gift for her.

Their work featured birds to represent Eisner's freedom after the Holocaust, hearts for love, words like "courage" and "hope," and quotes that the kids remembered.

One girl told Eisner, "You inspire me because you always look on the brighter side."

Eisner told her, "I hope you'll look on the brighter side of things, and [that] you'll be surrounded with flowers."

A male classmate told Eisner that the blue swirls in the picture he helped create represent "the good in your life, and how we love you, and we always like to see you here. The red represents the not-so-good part of your life, and how it got better."

Eisner was moved by the presentations. "Everything is so close to my heart."

Documentary captures Greek Holocaust history

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

As he chatted with friends in a coffee shop on the Danforth one day in 1999, George Gedeon, a Toronto news video editor of Christian Greek descent, suddenly realized that his knowledge of a troubling facet of modern Greek history was abysmally lacking.

When a friend mentioned that 62,000 Jews in Nazi-occupied Greece were murdered during the Holocaust, he was not only dumbfounded but embarrassed by his ignorance.

"I didn't know that," he said, adding that his schoolteachers never bothered to mention the Holocaust in their Greek history lessons.

Eager to educate himself, Gedeon, now 63, contacted the Jewish community in Thessaloniki, where 46,000 Jews were rounded up and deported to the Auschwitz-Birkenau extermination camp between March and August 1943.

George Gedeon

"That was the beginning of my introduction to Greek Jews," said Gedeon, who freely admits he was exposed to anti-Jewish stereotypes and tropes at home during his youth.

In 2000, video camera in hand, he went to Thessaloniki and met the president of its Jewish community. He told him he wanted to make a documentary film about Greek Jewry.

"He expressed support for my project," said Gedeon, who was born in Ismailia, Egypt, lived on the Greek island of Rhodes and immigrated to Canada after the Six Day War in 1967.

Armed with grants from donors, he returned to Greece four more times in the next few years and filmed yet more footage.

Having finished his 47-minute film, In the Presence of My Neighbours, he presented it at the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora in Tel Aviv in 2011. Shortly afterward, Channel 2, an Israeli TV station, broadcast it.

On April 4, the film is scheduled to be shown at Temple Sinai, and on Sunday, April 21 at 2 p.m., it is due to be screened by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival at the Sheppard Cinema 5.

In the Presence of My Neighbours is a broad and sympathetic survey of an ancient community decimated by the Nazis in a few short years. By his reckoning, Greece was home to 70,000 Jews before World War II, with the vast majority living in Thessaloniki.

Although Jews arrived in Greece during the Greco-Roman period and were integrated into Greek society, they were sometimes subjected to restrictions. And because Jews were associated with the crucifixion, and generally maintained good relations with Greece's Ottoman overlords, they aroused the enmity of some Christians, he notes.

When Greece was invaded by Italy in 1940, Jews serving in the Greek army conducted themselves with exemplary bravery. During the subsequent German occupation, Jewish citizens were marginalized, mistreated and forced to sell their properties at artificially depressed prices as most Greeks looked away in indifference.

By his estimate, 8,000 Jews survived, going into hiding with the assistance of Christians or escaping from the country altogether. Miraculously, 2,000 Greek Jews managed to return from the Nazi death camps.

In the wake of the war, Greece was one of the first European countries to repatriate property to rightful Jewish owners. In some cases, however, Jews had to launch lawsuits to retrieve stolen property.

Gedeon, in his film, claims that anti-semitism is alive and well in contemporary Greece. "Jews create problems for us," says a Greek. Still other bigoted Greeks claim that Jews were responsible for the 9/11 terrorist attack in Manhattan, deny the Holocaust and blame Jews for Greece's current financial crisis.

Gedeon is repelled by the neo-fascist Golden Dawn party, which fared relatively well in the last Greek national elections. It feeds on the dire economic situation and the presence of illegal immigrants in the country, he said.

Although embarrassed by the dark side of Greek history, the Greek government is positively disposed toward the Jewish community, he pointed out.

With only about 5,000 Jews living in Greece today, the future of the community remains murky. In an interview, Gedeon expressed optimism that it will prosper. "I do want to see Greece keep its Jews. They are happy and comfortable in Greece."

Gedeon, who recalls having seen and heard Israeli aircraft bomb Ismailia during the opening round of the Six Day War, is not certain whether his film will ever be screened in Greece.

"Holocaust survivors have told me it will never be shown in Greece," he said. "I hope they're wrong. Maybe an independent television channel will run it."

He added, "I don't dare show it to the Greek community in Canada. I've been accused of being a bad Greek. Often, they think I'm a traitor. Their first reaction is: 'You must be a Jew if your name is Gedeon.'"

Describing himself as a proud Greek patriot, he said he recoils from the unsavoury dimensions of Greece's past. Nevertheless, he fervently hopes that Greece will acknowledge its complicity in the Holocaust and come clean.

"My work will be completed if the Greek government says, 'We're sorry for what happened.'"

A Holocaust story with a happy ending

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Stories about the Holocaust tend to be dark and depressing, but Jenny Lynn Witterick's debut novel, My Mother's Secret, breaks that well-worn template.

"I thought it would be great to write a story with a happy ending," she said last week in an interview.

My Mother's Secret, which was scheduled to be published on March 25, by iUniverse Inc., is based on real events and is a profile of compassion and courage. It unfolds in Nazi-occupied Poland as Franciszka Halamajowa, a Polish woman, and her daughter, Helena, risk their lives to save Jews and a pacifist German soldier in the town of Sokol.

Before World War II, 6,000 Jews lived in Sokol. Only 30 survived, of whom 15 were rescued by Fransciszka and her daughter.

At Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, a plaque honours them as well as the more than 6,000 Polish Christians who have been recognized as Righteous Gentiles.

Witterick, 52, stumbled on the pair in the course of watching a film, Number 4 Street of Our Lady, during Holocaust Education Week in Toronto in 2011.

"It mesmerized and inspired me," she said. "It was so powerful and uplifting. There is good, even amid unspeakable evil. I couldn't stop thinking about it. This was a story worth telling, and I decided to write it. Inspiration is to the mind what food is to the body."

The message that her book conveys is compelling. "We all have a choice of how we live and who we want to become. We can choose compassion and kindness just by deciding so. You don't have to be exceptional to make a difference. You can become exceptional by making a difference."

Solely on the face of it, Witterick did not seem to be a person who would compose a novel set during the Holocaust. First, she is a financial analyst and investor, president of Sky Investment Counsel, Inc., rather than a professional writer or historian.

And second, she is of Chinese origin, an immigrant from the island of Taiwan who settled in Canada with her family in 1968 and who could not be more physically removed from the wartime killing fields of Poland. But as the old aphorism goes, appearances can be deceiving.

When Witterick started Grade 2 in Toronto, she could not speak English. By Grade 4, she was a star student, having surpassed most of her classmates.

"My English teacher advised me to pursue a literary career," she recalled. But her parents' financial situation was such that she could not afford to take "a long shot" on a career in writing.

So she gravitated toward finance. "I couldn't believe people would actually pay you to analyze and figure out companies," she said.

Witterick thinks she is drawn to the Holocaust, in part, because mainland Chinese civilians were subjected to mass atrocities by the Japanese army in the 1930s.

Jenny Lynn Witterick

And there are two additional things to consider, said Witterick, whose husband, Ian, directs the ear, nose and throat department at Mount Sinai Hospital.

She has many Jewish friends, including Brian Goldstein, a business partner she has worked with, on and off, since 1986.

Witterick's mother, Shu-Haw Kwok, worked in a women's clothing factory after her arrival in Toronto, and the people who were the kindest to her were Jewish. "Maybe my mother's experience had an influence on me," she said. (Her father, Ten Char Kwok, was an aircraft mechanic at Air Canada).

Canada, too, had an impact on Witterick. "We live in a multicultural society, and where else but in Canada would a Chinese girl learn about the Holocaust?"

When all these factors are taken into consideration, Witterick could not exactly be viewed as a neophyte when she began doing the research for My Mother's Secret. As she said, "I don't remember when I wasn't interested in the Holocaust. I'm drawn to stories of true courage where people somehow survive and beat the odds."

Witterick had amassed a fount of knowledge on the Holocaust when she sat down to write her novel. "Over the last 20 years, I'd read many survivors' memoirs and collected a lot of detailed information you can't get from regular research," she explained. Basically, she created characters around the facts, writing My Mother's Secret in simple yet affecting language in the hope of appealing to a wide age group.

She wrote whenever she had a spare moment. She could not travel to Poland because her demanding schedule ruled out such a trip.

Several publishers rejected her manuscript, saying the Holocaust has been retold ad infinitum. But Witterick was not crushed by the rejection slips, being confident that her relatively upbeat tale of goodness and survival was comparatively unique in the annals of Holocaust literature.

My Mother's Secret has changed her life. "I always wanted to write, and never did until now," explained Witterick, who's currently composing another novel.

Although Witterick is appalled by Holocaust deniers, she usually ignores them. "There will always be people who don't want to believe the truth," she said. "You can't change their minds. They wear blinkers. You dismiss them."

All proceeds from My Mother's Secret sold at Chapters/Indigo will be donated to the Love of Reading Foundation, which buys books for poor communities.

Son's memoir recounts dad's wartime heroism

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

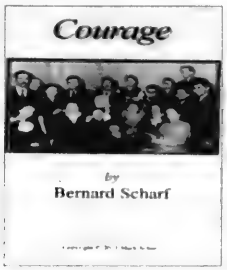
Many Holocaust survivors are reluctant to talk about what they went through during the war, but not Mark Scharf's father.

Bernard Scharf was a survivor who saved 55 people during the war. Mark Scharf recently published an account of his father's wartime experiences in a book titled Courage.

"Rightly or wrongly, I was exposed to my father's telling of his experiences to me from my earliest memory as a child," said Scharf, who is a lawyer in Barrie, Ont.,

"I realized much later that this was because he was proud of what he did to save himself and a total of 55 people, including some of the members of his family," he said.

"I was too young and too naive to really understand the significance of what my father was telling me. I didn't appreciate, at the time, the heroic nature of what he did and what he went through."



In the late 1970s, Scharf began recording his father's experiences. "He said that he wanted his children and grandchildren to have his written history of his experiences in the war," Scharf said.

Bernard Scharf was born in 1914 in the village of Maidan Pynanski, in part of what was then Poland, formerly known as Galicia.

Courage begins with Bernard's childhood and his experiences as a soldier during the war. He was in an anti-tank unit in the Polish army. He was on manoeuvres around Zlochev, Poland, in August 1939 when his regiment was ordered back to barracks in Zlochev on Aug. 28.

He returned to his family's farm, and eventually he and his family went into hiding from the Nazis in the forest with other Jews. The 55 people consisted of family he convinced to flee with him into the forest and stragglers who stumbled into the encampments from time to time.

In the book, Mark Scharf notes that aside from the possibility of being killed at any time and living in fear of that happening, "the physical effort to protect and feed many people on a daily basis was enormous."

As an example, while his father and the others were in hiding, his father would walk some 10 miles or more nightly in the snow, he said, without snowshoes, carrying heavy loads of food, together with a rifle and ammunition, through hostile conditions to bring supplies to the people he was caring for in the forest.

Bernard Scharf died in 1986 after suffering from dementia. Only recently, after Mark Scharf's mother died, did his sister, Esther Mandelbaum, find her father's notes. That is when Scharf decided to turn the notes into a book.

"For whatever reason, the true significance of my father's survival and heroic rescue of his extended family and others from the Nazi killing machine did not sink in until sometime after his death," he said.

Scharf told The CJN that his father believed it was important for his family, particularly his grandchildren, to understand his father's history, so that they could appreciate what he went through to come to a place like Canada, where they were safe and could prosper.

"I now more than ever appreciate his struggles and the self-sacrificing dimension of his personality. I believe others in the Jewish community might appreciate and be heartened by his story as well," Scharf said.

Copies of Courage, which includes pictures, are available by emailing mscharf@bellnet.ca or calling 1-705-487-1990.

Winnipeg Shoah Week features new highlights

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The community's annual Shoah Week will include two special highlights this year, the unveiling of a new section of the city's Holocaust Monument, with 250 new names inscribed, and the launch of Carol Matas' latest book.

The week kicks off April 7 with the traditional memorial service in the morning at Congregation Etz Chayim in north Winnipeg, and the sixth annual reading of Megillat Hashoah in the evening at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in south Winnipeg. As well, during the week, there will be the other usual programs such as B'nai Brith's "Unto Every Person, There is a Name" and the public Holocaust commemoration at the Holocaust Monument on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature, where the new section will be unveiled.

The Holocaust Monument was the first such memorial to the victims of the Holocaust to be erected on the grounds of a Canadian legislature. The original was dedicated in September 1990 by the Winnipeg Jewish community, with the support of then-premier Gary Filmon and his government, in commemoration of the Holocaust survivors and their families in Manitoba. There were 3,000 names originally carved into the monument.

"We have had an influx of newcomers in recent years," Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community relations director, noted. "Also, there were people who missed the earlier opportunity to participate in this project. So, last year, we sought out others who might want the names of their family members added to the monument."

Carol Matas

The new names were inscribed last summer and fall.

"We are grateful to the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the provincial government's Department of Multiculturalism for their generous support of this project," Faintuch said.

She added that because of the heavy snow cover still on the ground, the memorial ceremony this year may have to be moved indoors. After the ceremony, Christine Melnick, the minister of immigration and multiculturalism, will be hosting a special reception for Holocaust survivors in the legislature's Golden Boy dining room.

The other highlight will be the release of Matas' newest book, Pieces of the Past: The Holocaust Diary of Rose Rabinowitz. The book launch will take place April 9, at the Berney Theatre in the Asper Jewish Community Campus, in conjunction with McNally Robinson Booksellers.

The launch is being co-sponsored by the Holocaust Awareness Committee and the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

This is Matas' 43rd book, the 11th with a Holocaust theme. The primary audience for her books are elementary (Grade 5 and up) and secondary students, but she notes that she has some adult readers as well.

Her most recent novel is based on the arrival of Jewish war orphans in Canada in 1948. The book captures young Rose's life in flashbacks in the Warsaw Ghetto and in hiding.

"Scholastic [her publisher] had [Winnipeg Jewish historian] Allan Levine go over my manuscript," Matas said. "Allan was a tremendous help."

She also credits Dan Stone, a retired University of Winnipeg history professor, for his help. Stone, who is past president of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada, specialized in Polish history.

"Carol's new book is a wonderful recounting of the experiences of those orphans who came to Canada after the Holocaust, with the interplay of making new friends, adapting to a new country and reconciling with the past," Faintuch said. "It is also a look at Jewish Winnipeg at that time and the relationship with the general society. I think all of us would do well to read this book."

Matas said the book will probably be launched in Toronto in the fall.

One of her current projects is her first book just for adults. She describes When I Die as a coffee table book with thoughts and images related to death and dying.

"The concept came to me while I was meditating one day," she said. "My mother-in-law died last year and my father-in-law was quite ill for a time. I was thinking about them."

Her daughter-in-law, Bonnie Brask, provided the photos, she said.

Obama makes key statements about Israel

Much has been said about the significance of U.S. President Barack Obama's visit to Israel and the West Bank last month. Substantial coverage focused on what was – and was not –accomplished in the context of low expectations set out in advance of the trip (as discussed in last week's According to Reports).

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

One outcome was the surprise announcement on March 22, the last day of Obama's visit, that Israel and Turkey would re-establish full diplomatic relations. This followed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's apology to Prime Minister Recep Erdogan for the deaths of Turkish citizens during the 2010 Mavi Mamara incident. Obama was widely commended for carefully guiding this important reconciliation process. (That it may not be as smooth a process as originally thought is another matter.)

Until that announcement, most western media outlets concentrated on two subjects: the impact of Obama's trip on efforts to counter Iran's nuclear threat, and the effect Obama may have on the moribund Israeli-Palestinian peace process. (Space permits only a consideration of the latter.)

The headlines in major newspapers on March 22, the day after Obama delivered an important speech to a large gathering of students in Jerusalem – but also after he spoke earlier that day in Ramallah – indicated the state of media attention: "Obama urges Israel to strike peace deal" (Financial Times); "Demand peace, Obama tells Israelis" (Globe and Mail); "Obama Lays Out Case for Israel to Revive Peace Talks" (New York Times).

In short, with rare exceptions, the onus fell squarely on Israel to strike a deal with the Palestinians, even though the Palestinians have long been refusing to return to the negotiating table without preconditions. The story in the Globe and Mail (a report from the Wall Street Journal) took account of Obama's visit that morning to Ramallah but began this way: "U.S. President Barack Obama exhorted Israelis to come to terms with the Palestinians following a visit to the West Bank on [March 21], appealing for sacrifice in the name of peace."

As we have seen so often, there was no mention of what, if anything, is expected of the Palestinians "to come to terms" with Israelis. This gap makes the coverage not wrong (concerning what Obama said in Jerusalem) but fundamentally incomplete. And that incompleteness – the failure to provide a full account – results in a distorted picture.

What almost no media outlet paid any attention to was a critical line from what Obama said in his 1,300-word address in Ramallah in support of a two-state solution as the only way forward for Palestinians and Israelis: "We seek an independent, a viable and contiguous Palestinian state as the homeland of the Palestinian people alongside the Jewish State of Israel – two nations enjoying self-determination, security and peace."

Obama's use of the term "Jewish state" in front of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the Palestinian community was far from accidental. It was crucial and goes to the heart of the conflict: the historic refusal of the Palestinians and the broader Arab world to accept the reality of Jewish national self-determination in a small part of the Middle East.

Indeed, Obama repeated this theme (something entirely omitted from his 2009 Cairo speech), during his three-day visit beginning with his remarks upon landing in Israel on March 20: "[L]et me just reiterate that a central element of a lasting peace must be a strong and secure Jewish state, where Israel's security concerns are met alongside a sovereign and independent Palestinian state." He was most emphatic about this during his Jerusalem address, when he said the Palestinians "must" recognize Israel's Jewish character.

U.S. President Barack Obama

No wonder the Palestinians were very unhappy with Obama's message. Even though he criticized Israel over its settlement policy, saying that it's "counterproductive to the cause of peace," he did not make a halt to settlement activity a condition for resuming negotiations. But even more, he challenged the Palestinians to come to terms with the historic attachment of the Jewish People to its ancestral land.

The significance of Obama's repeated declaration on this subject should not be overlooked.

Deep-seated faith has helped us survive

Rabbi Charles Grysman

The timing of Yom Hashoah and Pesach blends recent history with the seminal event that gave rise to the Jewish People. As a child of a Holocaust survivor, both Pesach and Yom Hashoah evoke strong emotions in me. Our seders included in-depth conversations about the Exodus, the Holocaust and life in Poland before the war. My late father often expressed a profound sense of loss and emptiness, a result of losing most of his family in the Holocaust. He also exuded feelings of faith and perseverance. It was this latter quality that emphasized how faith can carry a person through any crisis.

Unquestioning faith was characteristic of the Jewish People's initial response to Moses and Aaron in Egypt. Rabbi Simcha Zissel of Kelm noted that the Torah says, "The people believed" even before Moses and Aaron had proven themselves. This happened later when Moses and Aaron went to see Pharaoh and weren't harmed by the lions that guarded the palace. Having belief precede proof showed the nation's trust and deep connection with God.

The deep-seated faith cultivated in Egypt was evident whenever the nation faced a crisis. Whether it was developing new avenues for worship after the destruction of the Temples or coping with the difficulties of persecution, the nation found a way to maintain its connection with God.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook suggests that this is why the Exodus is so dominant in Jewish liturgy. It's recited in the Kiddush for every holiday and explored in depth during the Passover seder. Highlighting the Exodus reminds God of the exuberant faith of a youthful nation in its God. As we find in Jeremiah (2:2), "I remember you were faithful in your youth, your love as a bride, how you followed me in the wilderness." Exuberant faith is evident in the way we rebound from crisis. After the Holocaust, this was evident in our national resurgence through the State of Israel and in our spiritual resurgence as seen in the expanding yeshiva movement and the growth of religious Judaism in general.

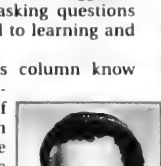
On Yom Hashoah, I will sit quietly in a memorial service and will remember those we lost. I will be overwhelmed by the trauma of losing six million Jews. I will think about the numerous family members I never met as I feel a cold emptiness in the depths of my soul. I will see my father's face and be reminded of the horrors he saw in Bergen-Belsen. I will see the strength that comes from having overcome tragedy and having the ability to begin anew. I will sing Ani Ma'amin and try to understand how that song of faith embodies the ongoing connection to God that was implanted in us in Egypt. I will look ahead to that burst of energy that characterized the Exodus from Egypt and will appreciate the vibrant Jewish life that is flourishing in the State of Israel and North America. I will look at my children and grandchildren and be inspired as they play a role in restoring and enhancing the dignity and vitality of our people.

Rabbi Charles Grysman is spiritual leader of Zichron Yisroel Congregation of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and teaches at Yeshivat Or Chaim.

Four questions about Jewish education

I write these words just days before Pesach, the holiday that, more than any other, focuses on children. We are mandated to ensure that every child – the wise and the wicked, the simple and the ignorant – be given an education, each according to their needs and abilities. The authors of the Haggadah understood that asking questions is the springboard to learning and commitment.

Readers of this column know that I often address the issue of funding for Jewish education. These pieces generate the greatest response, and the message must be repeated over and over again. We as a community can and must do more to fund Jewish education. Our response to this challenge will determine the future viability of Jewish life in the Diaspora.



The world economy is still feeling the impact of the financial crisis of 2008, and all signs point to it being years, and perhaps decades, until we're back to "normal." As I write this, banks in Cyprus are closed for fear of a run on them in reaction to the taxing of bank deposits. This, in turn, is an effort to deal with the enormous debt load in much of the Eurozone. What's so sad is that the signs of the financial crisis were there for all to see, if one cared to look. Most chose to ignore the warning signs until it was too late.

Our educational crisis is no different. On the surface, all seems fine. While enrolment has dropped almost everywhere in North America, we still have near-record numbers of students in our day school systems, and there is much to praise in them. Yet we await our own tipping point and the massive drop-off in day school enrolment that will follow due to the enormous financial burden being placed on parents. It's true we survived the financial crisis, and the Jewish community will survive even if we have a 50 per cent drop-off in enrolment. That would just put us back to where we were 30 and 40 years ago. But is that what we want?

Money Matters

In the spirit of Pesach, I present four questions for us to ponder.

Why is it that the wealthiest generation in all of Jewish history is unable to provide free (or very affordable) Jewish education for its children?

Why have we not copied the phenomenal success of Birthright Israel, which provides free trips for thousands of Jewish youths, and expanded it to "Birthright Education"?

Why do we bemoan the high assimilation rates in our community, yet at the same time insist that we're unable – or should I say unwilling – to properly fund the one institution that has demonstrated success in producing committed Jews?

Why can Warren Buffet and Bill Gates succeed in getting the superrich to donate a minimum of 50 per cent of their wealth to charity, while our community can't get the super-wealthy among us to commit 20 per cent?

While we might debate the answers to the above questions, not enough people are even asking them. If we want to ensure the Jews of tomorrow don't become the fifth child, who doesn't even attend a seder, we must address these questions today.

Young academics study Yiddish history and culture

The majority of Jewish victims of the Shoah were Yiddish speakers. One-third of the Jews of the world were killed in the Shoah, but they comprised a much higher percentage of the world's Yiddish speakers. While the Jewish people have, thank God, managed to recover and thrive since then, many fear that the Shoah was essentially a deathblow for the Yiddish language.

Optimistic Yiddishists find signs of life for the Yiddish language. One of the most surprising ones is the resurgence of interest in Yiddish in the academic world. The number of students actually studying the Yiddish language at most universities is low, but the number of professors researching and writing about Yiddish language, literature and culture is growing quickly.

Views & Reviews

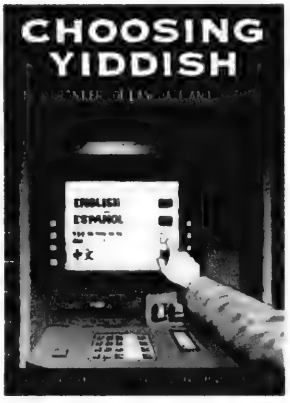
Martin Lockshin

For example, a new collection of academic essays has recently been published: Choosing Yiddish: New Frontiers of Language and Culture, edited by Lara Rabinovitch, Shiri Goren and Hannah S. Pressman. It contains 19 scholarly articles about Yiddish, all written in English, mostly by young academics.

Categories include "Yiddish and the City," "Yiddish Comes to America," and "Yiddish Encounters Hebrew." Although the editors explain in the introduction why the Shoah was not one of the groupings they used, nevertheless, their decision is puzzling, since the relationship between Yiddish and the Shoah shines through in a number of the essays.

My York University colleague, Kalman Weiser, has a fascinating article here about tensions within YIVO (the Yidisher Visnshaftlekher Institut [the Yiddish Scientific Institute, later renamed in English the Institute for Jewish Research]) between 1939 and 1940. The Amopteyl (short for Amerikaner opteyl or American Division) of YIVO took hesitant steps to move control of the organization and its publications to New York, at the time the city with the largest number of Yiddish speakers in the world, from the group's head office in Vilna. The YIVO office in Vilna was not pleased. It continued to see Europe, not the United States, as the centre of Yiddish culture and it was not willing to cede YIVO leadership to the Americans. Weiser's essay sheds light on the question of how much Jews in either the U.S. or Lithuania understood in 1939-1940 that the cultural dominance of Eastern European Jewry was over and that their physical end was near. Weiser highlights some of the curious ways that Lithuanian and American Yiddishists regarded each other then. In March 1940, the New York Yiddish newspaper Forverts wrote: "The problem with our America is what is called here making 'a living,' and in the present time it diverts much time and causes much concern. It is, however, different in Vilna. There, they don't make a living. The means don't exist... Therefore, they have more time and more patience for scholarly work."

Another Shoah-related essay is by Shiri Goren, of Yale University. She tells the moving story of the Hebrew poet and author, David Vogel (1891-1944), who was born in the Ukraine and moved first to Austria, then to the land of Israel, and eventually to France. There he was rounded up by the Gestapo and sent to Auschwitz, where he was killed in March 1944. Throughout his literary career, Vogel, a native Yiddish speaker, wrote and published only in Hebrew. But just before he was captured by the Nazis, he buried a manuscript that he had written entirely in Yiddish in the backyard of a home in Hauteville, in southeastern France. This very long manuscript of almost 150,000 words was found after the war and published both in the Yiddish original and in a Hebrew translation. Goren discusses what might have led a committed Hebraist like Vogel to return to his Yiddish roots as he felt his world coming to an end.



Aside from Shoah-related essays the book has other interesting pieces, a number of them with Canadian content. Shayn E. Smulyan of Brown University analyzes the use of Yiddish in the works of the Canadian hip-hop artist, SoCalled (born Josh Dolgin in small-town Quebec). Rebecca Margolis of the University of Ottawa describes the growth and initial success of Montreal's Yiddish-speaking National Secular Schools between 1910 and 1950. In 1955, New York City's Yiddish paper Tog-morgn zhurnal claimed that "if there has ever been the possibility of Jewish/Yiddish autonomy in English North America, it was in Montreal." Even today, Margolis writes, "Montreal stands out as home to one of the very few secular Jewish day school systems that continues to teach Yiddish" both at the elementary and high school levels. But the challenges were formidable even in the '20s and '30s of the last century. One Montreal Jewish educator wrote: "I recall going around in the hallways or in the yard at recess and telling the students, 'redt yidish' [speak Yiddish]. This went on for several years until we concluded that it was pointless."

The range of topics covered is surprisingly wide, from the treatment in the Yiddish press of the 1876 murder trial of Pesach Rubenstein, the "Hasidic slasher," to the political poems written in Yiddish by Jewish leftists who were outraged by the conviction in 1920 of two Italian immigrant workers Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti for murder in South Braintree, Massachusetts, on very flimsy evidence.

I enjoyed this book and recommend it if you're interested in Yiddish. But aside from the unsystematic treatment of the Shoah, I was surprised by another glaring absence. Only one of the nineteen essays said anything about the tens of thousands or perhaps hundreds of thousands of contemporary haredi Jews who speak Yiddish on a daily basis. With no disrespect for the scholars in this book, I would suggest that the real story of the survival of Yiddish now and possibly in the future is being played out not in academia or in the world of hip-hop, but in these religious enclaves in Israel and North America. While the academic study of haredim can be challenging, scholars who care about the future of Yiddish would be wise to pay close attention to the only sizable community that is really "choosing Yiddish" in our post-Shoah world.

Orthodox synagogue planning to rebuild

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After a couple of false starts, south Winnipeg's Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun synagogue, the city's largest Orthodox congregation, is back on track to the future.

The congregation, which numbers just under 100 member families, has for several years needed to replace its physical systems – including the close to 60-year-old building's original boilers. The matter came to a crunch last fall when the boilers were officially ruled out of service.

It is also necessary to improve the acoustics and to make the building – which has three levels – more energy efficient and more accessible to the very young, older people and those with physical disabilities.

The congregation originally announced a fundraising campaign last winter. The stated goal was to raise somewhere between $1.5 and $2 million to tear down the current structure and replace it with a smaller building on one level.

Other than a fundraising dinner last May, little more was heard.

The second chapter began last summer when the Herzlia board approached the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg with an offer to turn over ownership of its building and land to the federation. In return, the federation would help with the cost of replacing the worn out boilers and generally upgrading the building.

Federation president Israel Ludwig noted at the time that the federation was looking for a space for 60 new daycare spaces. "We have received a government grant to open 60 additional daycare spaces but lack the room at the Asper Campus to expand the existing daycare," he said. "It's a case of if we don't use it [the grant], we lose it."

The federation provided funding to hire a contractor and architect to draft a new initial building plan and drawings for the synagogue. That plan largely fell through when the federation saw the costs that would be involved.

It looks as if the third chapter will be the one with the happy ending for south Winnipeg's only Orthodox congregation. Herzlia president Earl Hershfield has announced that synagogue members have pledged close to $900,000 to upgrade their shul.

How large a building Herzlia will build depends on the federation-Rady Centre response, Hershfield said. "If we have to go on our own, we will build a smaller shul on one level. There are also other potential sources of funding we can look into."

Hershfield believes it would be a win-win for Herzlia and the community if the federation would put the additional daycare spaces into the new building.

Bob Freedman, the federation's longtime executive director, indicated that the federation will soon be on board. "Negotiations between the Rady JCC (the federation beneficiary that would operate the daycare) and Herzlia are going well, and an agreement looks to be close to completion," Freedman said. "Assuming an agreement is reached, the federation would be putting more than $500,000 into the Herzlia project. We should be able to finalize this at our next board meeting on April 3."

The congregation traces its origins back 106 years to the founding of the Adas Yeshurun congregation in the old north end. In 1955, the congregation chose to merge its synagogue with the Herzlia Academy, a Jewish school that had been opened in south Winnipeg the year before.

"My family and I believe that Winnipeg needs a strong Orthodox shul and we want the Herzlia to be that shul," Hershfield said.

BDS resolution passed at York University

Undergrad student union represents over 52,000

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Canada's largest university student association has passed a resolution to endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

The York Federation of Students (YFS), which represents more than 52,000 undergraduates at York University, voted on the resolution at a March 21 board meeting, after the Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA), a campus group, collected the requisite 5,000 student signatures to force the item onto the YFS' agenda. SAIA began collecting the signatures last fall.

The vast majority of YFS members present at the meeting voted for the motion, with 18 in favour, and only two against, according to a statement from SAIA.

In addition to having the YFS endorse the BDS campaign, the resolution also calls on York itself to "abide by the BDS call; specifically urging the university to withdraw its investments from Northrop Grumman, BAE Systems, Amphenol and other companies that are selling weapons and military equipment to Israel," SAIA said.

The YFS is the third student union in Toronto to endorse the BDS campaign in the current school year. The University of Toronto's Graduate Student Union and York's Graduate Students Association both voted to do so last fall.

Chaim Lax, president of Hasbara at York, a pro-Israel group, said he was upset by the March 21 result, since he believes the majority of York students don't support the boycott.

In a joint statement issued by Hillel and Hasbara groups at York, Lax called the BDS endorsement "fundamentally racist, and a possible violation of the university's anti-discrimination codes."

Ever since York's graduate students association passed its BDS motion last November, Jewish and pro-Israel groups at York have tried to galvanize student opposition to the BDS campaign, collecting some 4,000 signatures on a petition against it.

Five members from Hillel and Hasbara, including Jessica Cherkasov, president of the Hillel-affiliated York Students for Israel, spoke at the March 21 YFS meeting, presenting their own petition against BDS and urging the student federation not to vote on SAIA's motion.

Some pro-Israel supporters also questioned the vote's validity, saying they were surprised the YFS allowed SAIA to present the motion immediately after the group said it had gathered 5,000 signatures from York students, since the signatures hadn't been checked.

SAIA said it reached its total on March 19, but an external audit to verify the authenticity of the signatures had not been completed before the YFS meeting.

The issue of the signatures' validity was raised at the meeting, but did not affect the outcome of the vote, Lax said.

"Those signatures have not been verified for authenticity or duplication," said Howard English, senior vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. "We don't really know whether these are 5,000 genuine students."

The decision to hold the March 21 vote was made the previous day, giving pro-Israel students little time to mobilize.

Nevertheless, about 100 pro-Israel students showed up to the meeting, carrying Israeli and Canadian flags, Cherkasov told The CJN.

Cherkasov added that she's dismayed that the YFS, which is supported by mandatory dues from York undergraduates, would take a stand on a non-student issue, especially one that it says doesn't have strong student support.

"While we may have lost the vote, we do feel like we do have the support of the majority of students on campus who don't want to see their student government, to which they owe money, radicalized or politicized," Lax said.

Now that the motion has passed, SAIA will try to "bring its demand for divestment to the York University administration by lobbying for the implementation of a socially responsible investment policy," the group said in its statement.

However, York spokesperson Janice Walls noted that the YFS is completely independent from the administration.

"York University uses best practices in developing its policy on investments, and this is built on advice from major investment consulting firms," Walls said.

The pro-Israel students say the YFS vote has only strengthened their resolve.

"We will not let the YFS intimidate us and other groups," Cherkasov said. "We came in with a very positive attitude. We wanted to show that we have a unified front, as we always do."

The motion passed just two weeks after SAIA hosted Israeli Apartheid Week at York.

Representatives of SAIA and the YFS could not be reached for comment.

Jews, Rwandans to hold joint commemoration

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than half of Canada's Holocaust survivors and more than 5,000 members of the Rwandan community call Toronto home. This year, the commemorations of the atrocities that affected their communities fall on the same date.

In recognition of both Holocaust Remembrance Day and Rwanda Genocide Memorial Day, a compelling program hosted by the Azrieli Foundation on April 8 at Ryerson University will bring together survivors from the two communities.

"People from both these communities have had to overcome so much in their native countries and have contributed so much to their new homes in Canada. There is a great deal to learn from one another and much to share as they remember their distinctive pasts," said Naomi Azrieli, chair and executive director of the Azrieli Foundation.

"First-hand testimony is a powerful way to understand the incredible lives they have lived and remember those whom they have lost. It is our collective responsibility to make sure the next generation is aware of the atrocities that still face so many people around the world today, and with this knowledge, stand up for human rights in the future."

"Write to Heal: Genocide and Memoir" will explore the process of healing through writing and the power of personal testimony with survivor and academic speakers:

- Rachel Shtibel, Holocaust survivor and author of her memoir, The Violin.
- Dr. Régine King, assistant professor of social work at the University of Manitoba and Rwandan genocide survivor who is currently writing her memoir.
- Dr. Paula David, Institute for Life Course and Aging and the faculty of social work at the University of Toronto, who will discuss her work with Holocaust survivors and the challenges, benefits and effects on older adults of sharing their personal narratives.
- Leora Schaefer, Canadian director of Facing History and Ourselves, who will discuss the impact of memoirs on future generations.

The event will run from 7 to 9 p.m. at Ryerson University, 350 Victoria St., Toronto, Library 22. The event is open to the public but requires an RSVP to: susan@azrielifoundation.org or 416-322-5928.

Bulgaria: EU could still act against Hezbollah

JTA

SOPHIA — Bulgaria will provide further evidence to persuade the European Union to designate Hezbollah's armed wing as a terrorist entity, the country's premier said.

Some EU countries were "not sufficiently convinced" by Bulgaria's evidence of Hezbollah's involvement in a suicide bombing last year that killed five Israeli tourists and a bus driver, Marin Raikov, Bulgaria's interim prime minister, said in Brussels on March 27.

"We will continue the investigation," he said. "We will continue to work on this very seriously, very actively. We will provide the needed evidence."

Raikov also said his country would not request the classification of Hezbollah as a terrorist entity. "It's not for Bulgaria to initiate the technical procedure for the listing. I think that our partners will be able to do this once they reach a certain level of consensus on this issue," he said.

Bulgaria accused the Lebanese militant movement on Feb. 5 of carrying out a bomb attack on a bus in the Black Sea city of Burgas that killed the Israelis and their Bulgarian driver last July.

This led the EU to consider putting the group on its list of terrorist organizations, and discussions are now underway about whether to do so.

Many European governments are cautious about imposing sanctions on Hezbollah, arguing it could fuel tensions in the Middle East. Some have demanded evidence that withstands a trial.

A number of European diplomats have said that the conviction in Cyprus last week of a Hezbollah operative charged with plotting attacks on Israeli tourist targets, combined with the Bulgaria findings, has increased the likelihood of a designation.

The Netherlands is the only EU member state to officially consider the South Lebanese Shi'ite Hezbollah movement and militia terrorist entities, as do Israel, Canada, the United States, Australia and New Zealand. Britain considers only the group's military wing a terrorist entity.

Russian-Jewish oligarch was hanged, autopsy finds

JTA

LONDON — Russian-Jewish oligarch and Kremlin critic Boris Berezovsky was hanged, a post-mortem examination found.

There was no sign of a violent struggle, the Independent reported, citing Thames Valley Police. Further tests will take several weeks, the newspaper reported.

Berezovsky's body was found March 24 in the bathroom of his home in the London area.

Berezovsky, 67, once the richest man in Russia, fled to Britain about 10 years ago following a falling out with Russian President Vladimir Putin amid fraud charges that Berezovsky said were politically motivated. The Moscow native, the son of a Jewish father and a mother with Jewish roots, immigrated to Israel in 1993 but later renounced his Israeli passport, according to the Israeli news website Walla.

Berezovsky became a strident and frequent critic of Putin, accusing the leader of ushering in a dictatorship.

He accumulated his wealth in the years following the collapse of Soviet Russia by acquiring local firms, including oil companies and television stations, rising to prominence during the term of Boris Yeltsin in the 1990s. Russian media reported recently that Berezovsky had suffered heavy financial losses.

Mixed response to Israel's flotilla apology

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Minister of Economics and Trade Naftali Bennett criticized Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan's reaction to Israel's apology to Turkey on March 22 for the May 2010 Gaza flotilla incident in which nine Turkish nationals were killed.

"Since the apology was made public, it seems Erdogan is doing everything possible to make Israel regret it, while managing a personal, vitriolic campaign at the expense of Turkish-Israel relations," Bennett, who is the head of the national religious Jewish Home party, wrote on his Facebook page on March 27, in a post titled "IDF fighters, we are always with you."

Naftali Bennett

On March 26, Erdogan outlined, Turkey's conditions for full normalization with Israel. In addition to an apology over the Marmara episode and compensation to the victims, Turkey was also insisting that Israel lift its naval blockage of Gaza, he told lawmakers in the Turkish parliament.

The Turkish leader called the Israeli apology a "victory" for his country and its allies in the region, including Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, the Turkish newspaper Hurriyet reported. While the apology was initially welcomed as an important first step toward patching up relations, Erdogan said that an Israeli refusal to lift the blockade would be a deal-breaker.

Bennett warned Erdogan in his post that should "any future terror be aimed at us, our response will be no less severe," adding that "no country is doing Israel a favour by renewing ties with it."

Bennett ended his post by praising the Israel Defence Forces, telling its fighters that it is their duty to do everything to protect Israeli citizens, making sure they know that "the people of Israel are behind you."

Jewish Home MK Ayelet Shaked called Erdogan an "Islamist antisemite" on Channel 2 and reiterating that he was making Israel regret its apology.

MK Hanin Zoabi, who represents the Balad, was on the Mavi Marmara when it was boarded by the IDF's Shayetet 13 naval commandos on May 30, 2010. He said on Channel 2 that "what happened on the Marmara was not an operational mistake. What happened was a hijacking of the boat, an attack on the boat and the killing of nine activists."

She added that Turkey should demand an apology about the killings, the violence and the hijacking of the boat, but said that if she were Turkish, she would also feel national pride over Israel's apology Friday. "Israel refused to apologize for a long time... and, in the end, Israel gave in to the Turks and it's a source of pride," said Zoabi.

The Prime Minister's Office issued a statement on March 22 announcing that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had spoken with Erdogan and "expressed regret" for "operational errors" made during the raid on the blockade-busting Mavi Marmara. The announcement came just as U.S. President Barack Obama wrapped up his three-day visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories and was about to fly to Jordan.

Erdogan has consistently and sometimes vehemently opposed Israel in the international arena. In February, he compared Zionism to antisemitism and other "war crimes," precipitating a torrent of criticism from Israel and the international community.

Netanyahu, according to his office's account of the phone call, did not agree to lift the blockade. Netanyahu told Erdogan "that Israel has already lifted several restrictions on the movement of civilians and goods to all of the Palestinian territories, including Gaza, and added that this will continue as long as the quiet is maintained," his office said in a statement. "The two leaders agreed to continue to work on improving the humanitarian situation in the Palestinian territories."

Israel and Turkey have entered negotiations on a compensation package for the affected families, but these talks hit a snag on March 27 when it appeared disagreements arose over the sum of payments to the families, with Turkey demanding $1 million per victim, and Israel offering $100,000.

'Turkey has been a friendly country to Israel'

In response to these developments, Babali, a career diplomat who has served in Washington, D.C., London and Sofia, Bulgaria, said that Israel's apology was a long-standing demand after Israeli troops stormed the Mavi Marmara, the lead ship in a flotilla of ships heading toward Gaza.

"We never bluffed. We just insisted on a case we thought we were right. We stressed time and time again that Turkey has been a friendly country to Israel and the Jewish people. That was the main reason we expected an apology," Babali said.

"If we had not considered Israel as a friend we respected or valued the centuries-long historical bonds between our two nations, our reaction since the very beginning would have been totally different. Only true friends apologize to each other."

Tuncay Babali

Israel's apology was the outcome of "arduous negotiations" stretching back three years, he said.

The dispute worsened in February when Erdogan, a sharp and outspoken critic of Israeli policy vis-a-vis the Palestinians, described Zionism as a "crime against humanity" on a par with antisemitism and fascism. Erdogan claimed he had been misunderstood, but his slur sparked an international furor.

Netanyahu called it a "dark and slanderous remark." United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon described it as "hurtful and divisive." U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said he found it "objectionable."

A March 22 communiqué issued by Netanyahu's office elaborated on his apology by phone earlier that day: "In light of Israel's investigation into the incident, which pointed to a number of operational mistakes, the prime minister expressed Israel's apology to the Turkish people for any mistakes that might have led to the loss of life or injury and agreed to conclude an agreement on compensation."

Erdogan accepted the apology, saying he attaches "importance" to "the shared history and centuries of old ties of strong friendship and co-operation between the Jewish and Turkish peoples." He added that the deterioration of relations had been "regrettable," given Turkey's "vital strategic" relationship with Israel.

Erdogan, who plans to visit Gaza in April, also noted that Israel has substantially eased restrictions on the entry of civilian goods into the Palestinian areas, including Gaza, and that Turkey and Israel would work together "to improve the humanitarian situation in the Palestinian territories."

On March 25, Erdogan suggested that normalization would take effect only after Israel pays compensation and lifts its siege of Gaza. On March 27, the Jerusalem Post reported that a dispute on the level of compensation has broken out, with Turkey reportedly demanding $1 million for each person killed and Israel apparently prepared to pay $100,000.

Israeli President Shimon Peres had words of praise for the reconciliation agreement, while Gen. Benny Gantz, the Israeli chief of staff, said it "advances our interests."

Netanyahu said the current civil war in Syria was a major factor in his decision to issue an apology. Avigdor Lieberman, the former Israeli foreign minister, called the move "a serious mistake."

Babali, noting that Turkey was the first Muslim nation to recognize Israel and pointing out that Turkey and Israel had "strong political, economic and strategic" relations before the Mavi Marma incident, said that Turkey values its historical ties with Jews.

"We never had any problem with the Jewish People," he said. "When Jews were expelled from Spain, Portugal and elsewhere in Europe, the Ottoman sultan issued a formal invitation and sent his navy to bring them to Ottoman lands.

"During the 19th century, Jews from Russia found sanctuary in Ottoman land. And in the 1930s, a new era of Turkish assistance to Jewish refugees began when thousands of Jews fleeing Nazi persecution found refuge in Turkey or safely moved to Palestine [from Turkey]. Turkish diplomats in Vichy France, the island of Rhodes, in Greece and in other places put their lives on the line to save Jews."

Claiming that Erdogan is not an antisemite, Babali declared, "I categorically reject the smear campaign of labelling our prime minister, or other [Turkish] leaders, as antisemitic. Our leaders have stated on numerous occasions that they, like the rest of the Turkish people, are not antisemitic. Antisemitism is alien to the Turkish people, culture and tradition. Prime Minister Erdogan and Foreign Minister Davutoglu have said numerous times that antisemitism is a crime against humanity, and never questioned Israel's legitimate right to exist and its security concerns. Our sincere efforts in mediation between Israel and Syria between 2002 and 2009 should be seen as an indication of our approach."

Turkey supports all efforts to find "a just, lasting and comprehensive" solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict on the basis of a two-state solution, Babali said.

Early this year, Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon disclosed that Israel was prepared to mend relations with Turkey. Shortly afterward, Israel sent messages to Ankara voicing an interest in creating a more "positive dynamic" in its badly strained ties with Turkey. In the wake of this report, Ha'aretz reported that Netanyahu had rejected an offer by the then-Israeli defence minister, Ehud Barak, to write an apology to his Turkish counterpart.

In February, the Turkish newspaper Radikal reported that Israel might be ready to apologize. The report was published as Israeli and Turkish officials met in Rome to resolve the conflict.

Netanyahu's national security adviser, Yaakov Amidror, accompanied by the former director of the Israeli foreign ministry, Joseph Ciechanover, held talks with the director of Turkey's foreign ministry and Turkey's former envoy in Israel, Feridun Sinirlioglu. These discussions, however, ended in failure.

Late last year, Tzipi Livni, Israel's current justice minister and former foreign affairs minister, attempted to defuse the tension by seeking a meeting with Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu, but he declined to see her.

'When good people do nothing', evil can triumph

Compiled by CJN staff

U.S. President Barack Obama visited Yad Vashem on March 22. He visited the Hall of Names, the Museum of Holocaust Art, participated in a memorial ceremony in the Hall of Remembrance, and visited the Children's Memorial, before signing the Yad Vashem guest book. He was accompanied by Israeli President Shimon Peres; Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu; chair of the Yad Vashem directorate Avner Shalev, and chair of the Yad Vashem Council, Rabbi Israel Meir Lau.

In the Yad Vashem guest book, President Obama wrote, "We are ever mindful of the incredible human cost of the Holocaust, an evil unprecedented in the annals of history. And yet we recognize, through this place, the triumph of the Jewish people and the human spirit, and vow to be ever vigilant in preventing such horror from ever happening again."

At the conclusion of visit, President Obama said the following:

"And to them I will give my house and with my walls a memorial and a name, an everlasting name that shall not be cut off. President Peres, Prime Minister Netanyahu, Chairman Shalev, Rabbi Lau, thank you for sharing this house, this memorial with me today. Thank you the people of Israel for preserving the names of the millions taken from us, of blessed memory, names that shall never be forgotten.

"This is my second visit to this living memorial. Since then I've walked among the barbed wire, the guard towers of Buchenwald. Rabbi Lau told me of his time there, and we reminisced about our good friend Eli Wiesel and the memories that he shared with me. I've stood in the old Warsaw Ghetto with survivors who would not go quietly.

"But nothing equals the wrenching power of this sacred place where the totality of the Shoah is told. We could come here a thousand times and each time our hearts would break. For here we see the depravity to which man can sink, the barbarism that unfolds when we begin to see our fellow human beings as somehow less than us, less worthy of dignity, and of life. We see how evil can for a moment in time triumph; when good people do nothing, how silence can abet a crime unique in human history.

"Here we see their faces and we hear their voices. We look upon the objects of their lives, the art that they created, the prayer books that they carried. We see that even as they had hate etched into their arms, they were not numbers, they were men, and women and children, so many children, sent to their deaths because of who they were, how they prayed or who they loved. And yet here alongside man's capacity for evil we also are reminded of man's capacity for good. The rescuers, the Righteous Among Nations who refused to be bystanders, and in their noble acts of courage, we see how this place, this accounting of horror, is in the end a source of hope, for here we learn that we are never powerless, in our lives we always have choices. To succumb to our worst instincts, or to summon the better angels of our nature, to be indifferent to suffering wherever it may be, whoever it may be visited upon, or to display empathy that is at the core of our humanity, we have a choice to acquiesce to evil or to make real our solemn vow never again. We have a choice to ignore what happens to others or to act on behalf of others and to continually examine in ourselves, whatever dark places there may be that might lead to such actions or inactions.

"This is our obligation, not simply to bear witness, but to act. For us in our time, this means confronting bigotry and hatred in all its forms, racism, especially antisemitism. None of that has a place in the civilized world, not in the classrooms of children, not in the corridors of power, and let us never forget the link between the two. For our sons and daughters are not born to hate. They are taught to hate.

"So let us fill their young hearts with the same understanding and compassion that we hope others have for them. Here we hope, because after we walk through these halls, after you pass through the darkness there is light. The glorious view of the Jerusalem forest, with the sun shining over the historic homeland of the Jewish people, a fulfilment of the prophecy: You shall live again, upon your own soil. Here on your ancient land let it be said for all the world to hear, the State of Israel does not exist because of the Holocaust, but with the survival of a strong Jewish State of Israel such a Holocaust will never happen again. Here we pray that we all can be better, that we can all grow like the sapling near the Children's Memorial, a sapling from a chestnut tree that Anne Frank could see from her window. The last time that she described it in her diary she wrote: 'Our chestnut tree is in full bloom; it is covered with leaves. It is even more beautiful than last year.'

"That's a reminder of who we can be. But, we have to work for it. We have to work for it here in Israel, we have to work for it in America, we have to work for it around the world. To tend the light and the brightness as opposed to our worst instincts. May God bless the memory of the millions. May their souls be bound up in the bond of eternal life, and may each spring bring a full bloom even more beautiful than the last."

Arab Israeli is top singer

A Christian Arab from Acre became the first Arab contestant to win the popular television talent show The Voice. Lina Mahoul, 19, beat out Ophir Ben Shitrit, an Orthodox girl from Ashdod, to win the second season of the series. Mahoul sang Leonard Cohen's Hallelujah in the final episode of the program to clinch the win. Throughout the season, she had been mentored by Israeli singer Shlomi Shabat, who chose her in a blind audition. Last season, Canadian-born immigrant Kathleen Reiter took home the win.

Zygier's inadvertent costly leak

The man known as "Prisoner X" unwittingly caused the arrest of two Hezbollah supporters who were spying for Israel, a German magazine claims. Ben Zygier, the Australian-Israeli who allegedly was a Mossad agent, leaked highly classified information in a botched attempt to recruit a spy for the agency, according to an expose in Der Spiegel. Zygier, who had been returned from the field to a desk job at Mossad headquarters, was attempting to restore his reputation at the spy agency by attempting to turn an enemy into an ally, the magazine wrote. In the end, however, Hezbollah managed to extract from him the names of two Lebanese men working for the Mossad – Ziad al-Homsi and Mustafa Ali Awadeh – who were arrested in 2009 and sentenced to 15 years in jail, the magazine said. The report said Zygier started working with the Mossad in 2003, but was ordered back to Israel in 2007 because he was not delivering for the agency. He returned to Melbourne and operated independently in an attempt to restore his reputation, the magazine claimed. But, as he tried to prove his bona fides to a man linked to Hezbollah whom he wanted to become a double agent, he was the one who became the double agent, leaking the classified information.

UN worried at Syrian rebel movement

The UN Security Council voiced concern about the presence of Syrian government and rebel troops in the demilitarized area separating Syria from the Israeli-held Golan Heights. "The members of the Security Council expressed their deep concern at the risks that all military activities in the area of separation, conducted by any actor, pose to the long-held ceasefire and the local population," the Security Council said in a statement read aloud Wednesday by the Russian ambassador, Vitaly Churkin. A Security Council release named Syrian government and rebel troops as entering the demilitarized area. The UN Disengagement Observer Force monitors an "area of separation" between Syrian and Israeli forces, a narrow strip of land running 45 miles from Mount Hermon on the Lebanese border to the Yarmouk River frontier with Jordan.

Obama meets wannabe future head of Intel

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — With the retirement of Intel CEO Paul Otellini, the company is looking for a replacement who can help lead it to greater success. Various names have been bandied about, including Intel executive vice-president David (Dadi) Perlmutter from Israel.

But there's another candidate from these parts: Jerusalem resident Sa'id Haruf, 26, a top-level Intel engineer who'd like the opportunity to run Intel himself. That, at least, is what Haruf told U.S. President Barack Obama when he visited the Israel Museum for a look at top Israeli high-tech inventions and innovations.

Haruf was there representing Intel, as well as Maantech, the hi-tech "finishing school" for Israeli Arabs, which was developed to help them become more integrated into Israel's hi-tech scene. Haruf told Obama about Maantech, which trains Israeli Arabs to interview, prepare resumes and improve their Hebrew and English skills.

The encounter impressed the president sufficiently that he referred to Maantech when he later spoke at a press conference in Ramallah. Israelis and Palestinians, Obama said, "are both very entrepreneurial peoples," and could work together to advance the entire region, as they do "in a program that helps Israeli Arabs" in Israel's hi-tech industry "started by Cisco CEO John Chambers." Obama added that he had heard about the program at the museum.

"Imagine if you could have a strong Palestine that could create jobs and prosperity for all," Obama said.

Haruf was being just a bit tongue in cheek when he told Obama that he wanted to run Intel. "I would settle for something smaller, too," he told the Times of Israel. But for Arab college graduates seeking a hi-tech career in Israel, Intel is one of the best places to apply. The company has 600 engineers from the Arab sector. It's the largest hi-tech employer of Israeli-Arabs – and it has been for decades – Haruf said.

"My message to Israeli Arabs is that with determination and hard work, they can get jobs in hi-tech, and advance to senior positions. I want to increase the motivation of other young people to study engineering and other hi-tech subjects, and not be afraid to look for work in the industry," Haruf told Obama.

Then, he told Obama about his own plans. "In 20 years' time, I want to be president of Intel" or some other large hi-tech company "that provides opportunities and jobs for Arab students."

Obama's response? "He sort of chuckled, and said 'Why not?'" Haruf said.

Haruf studied in Lebanon and is now working on a master's degree at the Technion in Haifa. He lives in east Jerusalem, and admits to feeling uncomfortable among Israelis, mostly because of the different cultures among Jews and Arabs, and the language barrier. There's also discrimination in the workplace against Arabs, he said, because many Jews, in their turn, are ill at ease with Arabs.

But he feels quite comfortable at Intel, where his wife also works. "I have never experienced any discrimination in the company, neither in Israel nor in the United States, where I was working for several years. In addition, there is only full respect for my culture, from all perspectives. Intel has made it a policy to seek out people from other cultures and to promote diversity, in the belief that different people will contribute different ideas, which can be used to revolutionize technology."

Maantech is a great tool to ensure that engineers and other tech workers from the Arab sector can cope in the Israeli hi-tech sector, Haruf said.

The program was established in 2011, after President Shimon Peres and Cisco CEO John Chambers met at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. At the meeting, the two discussed ways to help bridge the gap between Israel and its Arab neighbors, as well as with its own Arab population. Hi-tech seemed an obvious solution, and to that end Peres and Chambers established the program.

Making water better, molecule by molecule

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

BE'ER SHEVA — Israel's got one of the most advanced water desalination programs in the world and dozens of successful water conservation and reclamation projects.

Now, cutting edge Israeli research on water technology will make its way to American academia, as the University of Chicago (UChicago) and Ben-Gurion University (BGU) have signed a partnership agreement to create new water production and purification technologies for deployment in regions of the globe where freshwater resources are scarce – based on nanotechnology.

Israel is a world leader in desalination technology. At this plant near Hadera, salt water is converted to fresh water that can be used in agriculture or for human consumption. (Flash90 photo)

The plan includes the establishment of a research centre based in both Chicago and Be'er Sheva where "the molecular aspects of water science and technology will result in a powerful new approach for addressing the various and pervasive challenges to the global water supply," said UChicago president Robert Zimmer at a recent signing ceremony in Chicago with BGU president Rivka Carmi.

Nanotechnology is the science of manipulating molecules to achieve positive results, and is responsible for major advancements in areas such as medicine and energy. As applied to water, nanotech could speed up and lower the cost of desalination, more effectively recycle waste water, save water in manufacturing, utilize water better for energy production, and others. Ben-Gurion, located on the cusp of the Negev desert, is one of Israel's most experienced water technology institutions; the school has hundreds of patents for water technologies.

Leading the Chicago side of the collaboration will be Matthew Tirrell, the Pritzker director of UChicago's Institute for molecular engineering. Tirrell's team will include scientists from Argonne National Laboratory, which UChicago manages for the U.S. Department of Energy. Leading the Israeli side will be Moshe Gottlieb, BGU's Frankel Professor of Chemical Engineering.

"Water is the most fundamental molecule for sustaining all forms of life, but it is in dramatically short supply in many parts of the world," Tirrell said.

"Water in all parts of the world faces numerous threats, which in turn endanger human and economic health."

The dangers include increased demand driven by energy production, agricultural run-off, depletion and contamination of aquifers by salt water and by industrial, organic and biological toxins.

"Such large-scale problems must be met by solutions developed from a comprehensive and integrated science and technology base of the type we will establish between the University of Chicago and Ben-Gurion University," Tirrell said.

UChicago and BGU researchers will meet next month in Be'er Sheva to begin discussing interdisciplinary collaborative water-related research projects of technical and societal significance. Joint activities may include the exchange of visiting faculty members, researchers and students; the development of funding proposals for collaborative work; and the creation of innovative commercial technologies and new business ventures, BGU said.

A definitive biography of Leonard Cohen

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Everybody knows that Leonard Cohen is the man. An acclaimed poet, novelist and songwriter, he is Canada's answer to America's Bob Dylan.

Cohen's advancing years should indicate he is well past his prime, but the opposite is true. Like old wine, Cohen gets better with age, at least judging by a concert in Toronto I attended last December. For three hours, he regaled thousands of fans, who burst into applause when he finished one of his signature brooding numbers.

Although Cohen is a public figure, he is a shy, private person. Sylvie Simmons, in I'm Your Man: The Life of Leonard Cohen (McClelland & Stewart), breaks past his façade in a definitive biography.

A music journalist who has closely followed Cohen's career, Simmons is nothing if not meticulous. Her book is a primer on the importance of excellent research.

She starts with his "privileged" background in Montreal. The scion of a wealthy and accomplished family originally from Lithuania, Cohen was born in 1934 and raised in the lap of luxury in Westmount, a fashionable neighbourhood in the folds of Mount Royal. Cohen's father, Nathan, was a manufacturer of formal wear. His mother, Masha, was a rabbi's daughter who spoke Russian and Yiddish.

At Masha's encouragement, Cohen took piano lessons, only to switch to the clarinet. Along with two McGill University friends, he formed a country-and-western band, The Buckskin Boys, which catered to the then popular square-dancing market.

Cohen was drawn to poetry after reading The Selected Poems of Federico Garcia Lorca. But like some men of his generation, he trafficked in poetry to attract women, having learned that "stories and talk" were an irresistible combination.

In Simmons' estimation, he became a poet at McGill, his talents honed, in part, by the courses of Louis Dudek. Cohen's first published collection of poems, Let Us Compare Mythologies, edited by Dudek, brought him to the attention of the media. His second volume of poetry, The Spice-Box of Earth, published five years later in 1961, prompted a Toronto Star reviewer to hail him as "probably the best young poet in English Canada right now."

Thanks to his foray into poetry, he met Irving Layton, 22 years his senior. They could not have been more different, suggests Simmons. Layton was a brazen self-promoter, while Cohen was modest and self-effacing. Yet the pair maintained a durable friendship until Layton's death.

Simmons devotes considerable space to Cohen's sojourn on the Greek island of Hydra, and her focus on it is justified. After visiting Israel for the first time, Cohen discovered Hydra, a haunt of bohemians where he felt at home. There he met Marianne Ihlen, the first love of his life, and wrote his first two novels, The Favourite Game and Beautiful Losers.

Disappointed by their lack of financial success, Cohen talked about becoming a folk music performer and making records. But it was not until 1967, with the Songs of Leonard Cohen, that he finally made his debut.

Curiously enough, he did not like touring. He had a problem with stage fright and feared that his songs would not be appreciated. As Simmons writes, "He wanted to protect them, not parade and pimp them to paying strangers in an artificial intimacy."

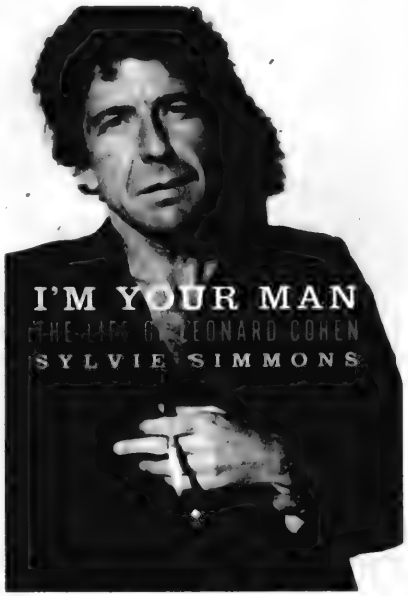
Nonetheless, he flew to Israel to perform for Israeli troops during the Yom Kippur War. His motives were pure. "I've never disguised the fact that I'm Jewish, and in any crisis in Israel I would be there. I am committed to the survival of the Jewish people."

For the next few weeks, Cohen travelled by truck, tank and jeep to entertain soldiers up to eight times a day. And he wrote a song, Lover Lover Lover, in Israel.

Despite his affinity for his Jewish background, he was attracted to Buddhism, a topic Simmons explores at length. Cohen joined the Mount Baldy Zen Center, high in the San Gabriel mountains and some 80 kilometres east of Los Angeles.

He lived austerely in a simple cabin set on the grounds of a monastery, and according to Simmons, he was quite happy performing menial tasks and cooking for and chauffeuring around its spiritual leader.

Cohen likened the Zen Center to a hospital and himself and his fellow residents to "people who have been traumatized, hurt, destroyed and maimed by daily life."



Leonard Cohen

In 1996, three years into his experience on the monastery, he was ordained a Zen Buddhist monk. But in 1998, he left Mount Baldy, where at times he had found contentment and where he wrote 250 songs and poems in various states of completion.

Cohen prospered as an entertainer, only to find out in 2004 that his longtime manager, Kelley Lynch, had swindled him out of millions of dollars and brought him to the brink of bankruptcy.

As Simmons observes, Cohen was tempted to cut his losses and walk away from the disaster that had befallen him. His lawyers balked, informing him that a lot of the missing money in retirement accounts and charitable trust funds left him liable for crippling tax bills.

Eventually, Cohen recovered some of the stolen funds, but the fiasco prompted him to return to the stage. "Of all the options available to him for making a living, the only one that appeared even remotely feasible was going back on the road," writes Simmons.

He was 73 when he began to consider the possibility of resurrecting his concert career. Yet he was torn by nagging doubts, fearing he might embarrass himself in front of audiences.

His fears were misplaced. Cohen's first gig, in Fredericton, N.B., on May 11, 2008, was a resounding success.

More bookings kept coming and again he triumphed, in countries as far-flung as Serbia, Israel and Turkey.

Cohen's concerts in 2008 and 2009 grossed more than $50 million, and in the process, he earned back all that he had lost.

At this point, he could have retired without too many qualms, she writes. Instead, with his Old Ideas tour, which touched down in Toronto's Air Canada Centre late last year, he has chosen to enlarge his already considerable fan base and burnish his reputation as a Canadian legend.

Film Festival offers an eclectic lineup

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from April 11 to 21, has an eclectic lineup of movies from around the world.

A sampler:

Roberta Grossman's rousing documentary, Hava Nagila (The Movie), joyously explores the origins and success of a song that has seeped into Israeli and American cultures and graced countless Jewish weddings and bar mitzvahs. Described as a kitschy yet profound tune signifying hope, Hava Nagila is, depending on your view, a "portal" into Jewish history and tradition or a "greasy cliche" of Jewish music.

Rainbow unfolds in the Gaza Strip after an Israeli army patrol is ambushed.

Grossman takes us on a sentimental journey to the rustic Ukrainian town of Sadagora, where Hava Nagila was apparently born, the brainchild of a cantor named A.Z. Idelsohn, who was inspired by chassidic nigun. Or maybe, as she suggests, it was written by Moshe Nathanson, whose proud American descendants sing his praises.

Hava Nagila, fused with the Romanian hora dance, became the unofficial folk song of a nascent Jewish nation in Palestine. In contemporary Israel, however, it is not so popular. But in the United States, it was immensely popular in the Jewish community and a mainstream hit sung by the likes of Connie Francis, Harry Belafonte and even Bob Dylan. In the former Soviet Union, chanteuse Regina Spektor claims, it was a symbol of resistance to cultural and religious oppression. Hava Nagila (The Movie) moves along at a steady clip, and is hugely entertaining.

Bloor Cinema on Sunday, April 21 at 8 p.m.

Broadway Musicals: A Jewish Legacy, by Michael Kantor, contends that the Broadway musical is basically a construct of the Yiddish theatre and of cantorial melodies, and that it played a meaningful role in giving American Jews "a shot at acceptance" in the United States.

The evidence is irrefutable, judging by the preponderance of Jewish composers and lyricists on Broadway. Their plays have run the gamut from Show Boat, Oklahoma and South Pacific to West Side Story, Funny Girl and Cabaret.

Among such shining luminaries as Oscar Hammerstein, George and Ira Gershwin, Jerome Kern and Irving Berlin, Cole Porter was singularly the only gentile in the pre-World War II period who composed for Broadway. And he supposedly claimed that he was successful solely because he wrote "Jewish tunes."

In the more modern era, the authorship of Broadway musicals has rested with, among others, Alan J. Lerner, Stephen Sondheim, Leonard Bernstein, Jerry Herman and John Kander.

Broadway Musicals, featuring interviews with composers and historians, is thoroughly fascinating.

Royal Ontario Museum, Thursday, April 18 at 1 p.m.

The festival's opening night film, CowJews and Indians: How Hitler Scared my Relatives And I Woke Up In An Iroquois Longhouse – Owing the Mohawks Rent, is an original film that teeters on the edge of the surreal and the absurd. It is also, sometimes at least, hilariously funny.

The filmmaker, Marc Halberstadt, tries to reclaim property his Jewish parents lost after the rise of Nazism in Germany. He devises an ingenious scheme to achieve his objective: Let native American people lodge the reparation claim.

What, you may ask, is the connection between the Nazis and aboriginal Americans? Halberstadt's mother, Milly, who immigrated to the United States in 1937, bought a house in Malone, N.Y. on land owned by Indians. Get it?

Halberstadt leads a native American delegation to Germany, and the Germans react with a mixture of puzzlement and bemusement.

Bloor Cinema on Thursday, April 11 at 8:30 p.m.

Rainbow, by Eliran Elya, is set in the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip in 2004. After an Israeli army patrol is wiped out by Palestinians in an ambush, a group of Israeli soldiers move in to secure the area and retrieve body parts. They decamp in a Palestinian home, expecting to leave shortly. As they wait, boredom descends and tension breaks out. What happens next is the stuff of grief and tragedy.

Elya keeps the film moving at a breathless pace, and the acting is on a high level.

Innis Town Hall, Monday, April 14 at 8:30 p.m.

Aya, directed by Mihal Brezis and Oded Binnun, unfolds during one afternoon and evening in Israel as a Danish music researcher arrives and is met at the airport by a total stranger who drives him to his destination in Jerusalem.

Novelist inspired by his grandmother's stories

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

When Kenneth Bonert was a boy in Johannesburg, South Africa, his grandmother would regale him with nostalgic stories about her shtetl in Lithuania, where she was born and raised.

Speaking mostly in Yiddish, with snippets of broken English thrown in, Hanna-Raizel, a gentle and loving person considered the matriarch of the family, would recall the village of Dusat, which might as well have been as far away from Africa as a distant alien planet.

"I would sit with her in the garden of our suburban home and listen to her stories," he said. "She would tell me about the kinds of things they would bake, about cold winter nights and Shabbat routines, about walks in the woods to pick berries and how the lake would freeze over in winter."

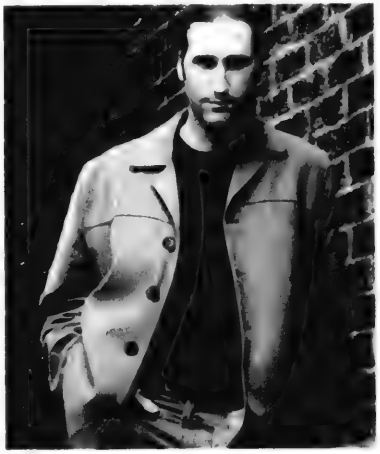
Hanna-Raizel, too, would talk about a cow she cared for and milked in a shed behind their house and describe a communal winter cellar where food would be stored in different pots marked with people's names.

"There were also stories about hard times – bombs falling during World War I, German troops moving into villages, fires and anti-Jewish riots," he added. "These things played a much smaller role in her stories," he said.

In general, Hanna-Raizel harboured sweet memories of Dusat, which had a Jewish population of about 400 on the eve of World War II.

Hanna-Raizel left Dusat in the mid-1920s, following her husband, a shoemaker, to South Africa in search of better prospects. Hanna-Raizel died in 1995, but her Lithuanian stories have exerted a lasting impact on Bonert. So much so that he dipped into them for inspiration in his debut novel, The Lion Seeker (Alfred A. Knopf Canada), which was published recently and hailed as "riveting" and "lyrical" by critic Charles Foran.

A coming-of-age historical novel set largely in South Africa in the years leading up to World War II and filled with unspoken family secrets, The Lion Seeker turns on two characters, Issac Helger, the son of Jewish immigrants from Lithuania, is trying to fight his way out of poverty. His emotionally scarred mother, Gitelle, is desperate to extricate her relatives from Dusat.



Kenneth Bonert

"What happens is that these two drives intersect, forcing a terrible choice on Isaac," explained Bonert, a former journalist who immigrated to Canada with his parents in 1989, before the long night of apartheid in South Africa was supplanted by a multiracial democracy.

Bonert, 40, is thrilled by the publication of The Lion Seeker, the U.S. edition of which comes out in October.

"I've always wanted to be a writer, and to be one on a high level," he explained. "To become a great novelist has been and still is my life's ambition. I've worked hard and stayed committed to this goal, made a lot of sacrifices along the way, and now that I've finally published a novel that I'm proud of, I feel satisfied to have taken a major step forward."

It took him five years to write The Lion Seeker, which is essentially a moral exploration of how wider social forces affect individuals and families.

Although he did not visit Lithuania, he did the next best thing. He interviewed a woman who had spent years documenting the oral histories of Jews from Dusat, including members of his own family.

When he began, he thought he would write the novel in two separate parts, the first taking place in Dusat and the second unfolding in South Africa. He was not pleased by the result, but it was not an exercise in futility. He had formed a broad understanding of his fictional characters and had learned how to transliterate Yiddish into English in a fresh way.

Putting pen to paper again, Bonert decided to focus on the South African segment. "I struggled to find the right narrative voice for Isaac, but once I slipped into the present tense, the story became alive and vibrant and I knew I had something."

The next challenge was to weave Dusat into the fabric of the narrative. He achieved his goal by telling the story from Isaac's point of view. "I think one of the main achievements of the book lies in the dialogue, the fluid movement between languages – Yiddish, English, Afrikaans and South African slang – that has never been recorded before. I had to create a unique form of punctuation to convey this fluidity, and had to find a way of making the meaning accessible while still retaining authentic expressions."

In Issac, he believes he has created an enduring character. As he put it, "I wanted him to transcend the novel and become a memorable figure in Jewish literature, a new kind of tough and authentic Jewish South African I hadn't seen previously portrayed."

But as he hastened to add, Dusat is also an integral part of The Lion Seeker, a place that exists in the memories of the characters, influenced their lives and set them on their respective trajectories. "So my novel is as much about how you cannot escape the past as it is about life in a new country."

As he reflected on his beloved grandmother, Bonert expressed sadness that the shtetl of her youth has vanished.

"There were probably around 1,000 Jews in Dusat at the beginning of the 20th century. Due to emigration, its Jewish population gradually dwindled."

In 1940, the Soviet army occupied Lithuania, snuffing out its short-lived independence. Many Lithuanians welcomed the subsequent Nazi occupation, regarding it as a blessed liberation from Soviet tyranny.

But for the Lithuanian Jewish community, the Nazi presence was an unmitigated disaster, ushering in a genocide in which more than 95 percent of Jews were killed, the highest murder rate during the Holocaust.

Jews in Dusat, having been squeezed into a ghetto and forced to perform hard labour, were marched into a forest on Aug. 26, 1941 and shot along with Jews from surrounding towns.

Bonert, a native of Johannesburg, grew up in the shadow of these horrific events. Ironically, the teachers in the Jewish schools he attended never taught him that apartheid, or institutional segregation, was evil and unjust.

"With the exception of my father, I don't remember any other adult talking openly and vociferously against it. The Jewish community tended to underplay apartheid as a relatively minor, if disagreeable, characteristic of South African society. The community generally prospered and benefited from the system without making too many waves."

Bonert, who earned a degree in journalism from Ryerson University, was a staff reporter for the Canadian Press and the Pembroke Observer. On the side, during his spare time, he was a creative writer, publishing short stories in literary journals and a novella, Peacekeepers, 1995.

"Right now," he said, "I'm polishing a collection of short stories and working on another novel."

Bodybuilding legend Joe Weider dies at 93

Compiled by CJN Staff

Joe Weider, who, with his brother Ben, built the biggest bodybuilding empire in the world, died March 23 at age 93 in Los Angeles.

Weider, the Montreal-born son of poor Jewish immigrants, left Montreal for New York in 1947, and had lived in California since the early 1970s.

His younger brother, Ben, who remained in Montreal, died in 2008.

Obituary

Joe Weider became famous for having discovered an unknown Austrian hunk named Arnold Schwarzenegger, who would go on to be an international superstar on the bodybuilding circuit, a Hollywood actor and governor of California.

According to their autobiography, Brothers of Iron, Joe Weider began lifting weights to put some muscle on his scrawny frame.

Building his strength and improving his appearance boosted his confidence, and he realized that many others would also benefit from such training.

In the depths of a Depression and with only a few dollars, the teenaged Weider launched a muscle magazine that he put together himself on his family's dining room table. That modest periodical laid the foundation for the brothers' multimillion-dollar publishing business, which expanded to include fitness equipment and nutritional supplements.

The Weiders transformed bodybuilding from what was then the obscure pastime of a few physique-obsessed people into a respectable sport, organized under its own international federation.

Joe Weider

Weider also created the Mr. Olympia contest, which his protégé Schwarzenegger won seven times. Weider, who developed a rippling masterpiece of a physique in his heyday, was the trainer of many other bodybuilding champions.

The honour Weider said he was most proud of was the Distinguished Citizen Award from the Boy Scouts of America in 1991, which hailed him as "the father of fitness."

In the foreword to Brothers of Iron (2006), Schwarzenegger, then still California governor, wrote: "One word sums up Joe's role in my life – father. After my own father passed away, Joe more than filled the gap… Joe's generosity to me knew no bounds. I honestly don't know where I'd be or what I'd be doing if Joe had not come into my life."

Former NBAer enjoying Israel's hoops Super League

Deena Rosenblatt
Tazpit News Agency

JERUSALEM — Over the years basketball has become increasingly popular in the Holy Land. The Israeli Basketball Super League, the top echelon of the sport, attracts athletes from around the world, including former NBA players.

Hapoel "Migdal" Jerusalem is home to nine Israeli players and five from abroad, including four Americans. Its most recent recruit is power forward/centre Craig Smith, who played for six seasons with the Minnesota Timberwolves, the Los Angeles Clippers and the Portland Trailblazers.

Originally from Inglewood, Calif., Smith graduated from Fairfax High School and went on to play Division I basketball at Boston College. Smith graduated as the team's leader in rebounds and was the second highest scorer. After college, he went on to be drafted into the NBA. After six years, he came overseas to continue his career in his seventh pro season.

Although it was difficult for Smith to leave his family and fiancé, they have been very supportive. "It's a once in a lifetime experience living in Israel for a year, [especially] with so much history [and] biblical aspects," Smith said. He finds a lot of meaning in playing "where [his] homey Jesus is from."

Smith views coming to Israel not only as an opportunity to play basketball, but also as a "learning opportunity on and off the court." He had lived in the United States his whole life and explained that he was "always curious to know what it would be like to live abroad [and also] learn another culture and adapt to it….Jerusalem felt right in this situation."

Another factor in cementing Smith's decision to play in Israel was the encouragement he received from former American Hapoel Jerusalem player Roger Mason. Smith also cited the weather, which is similar to that in his native California.

Since Smith stepped off the plane, Hapoel has opened its arms and welcomed him warmly to its hoops family. The Israelis and Americans on the team are very close and "often joke around with each other," Smith said.

He's also been invited by his teammates to several Shabbat meals, which have all been eye-opening experiences. When Smith encounters religious people in Israel, he enjoys learning about their traditions. "They will explain to you what the process is before you can eat….all the different types of Jewish culture here are pretty cool," he stated.

When asked about the differences between NBA and Israeli-style basketball, Smith points to variances in rules.

"In the NBA, a player cannot stay in the key for more than three seconds or it is a violation, while in Israeli basketball there is no such rule."

In addition the game in Israel is more physical "which is a little tough," Smith said. The Super League plays "a little bit more of a team game" in contrast to the NBA where there is more of an individualized effort. In the Israeli league, Smith feels he is more of a focal player and a target, which he explains is "a great honour."

Based on Smith's overall experience, he recommends the overseas experience to any basketball player. It "will definitely enlighten you; make you a better person at the end of the day and more knowledgeable about the world."

crowded terminal for a friend to appear when a taxi driver asks her to greet the Dane (Ulrich Thomsen) for him while he takes a break. Aya's life thus takes a turn in a different direction. By default, Aya becomes his host, driver and confidant, and as they talk, they connect on an emotional level.

Aya, distinguished by two stellar performances, is an unusual and riveting drama about the nature of relationships.

Sheppard Cinema 3, Sunday, April 14 at 3 p.m. and Bloor Cinema on Thursday, April 16 at 7 p.m.

Aliyah, a French film directed by Elie Wajeman, takes place mostly in Paris as Alex, a 27-year-old drug dealer, prepares to make aliyah. For no apparent reason, Alex and his friend have decided to open a restaurant in Tel Aviv. Quite possibly, Alex thinks he can rehabilitate himself in Israel. But his older brother, Isaac, a good-for-nothing, continues to be a financial drain on him.

The film unfolds as Alex raises funds for his upcoming trip, goes about his usual business, confers with low-life associates, learns rudimentary Hebrew, visits relatives on a Jewish holiday and flirts with his girlfriend.

Aliyah, regrettably, is a run-of-the-mill production that leaves no trace in its wake.

Bloor Cinema, Wednesday, April 17 at 7 p.m.

The children of coffee farmers in Uganda.

Delicious Coffee Grows in a Ugandan Coffee Bean, directed by Curt Fissel, uplifts the spirit. When the price of coffee – the most traded commodity after oil – in Uganda falls precipitously, Christian, Muslim and Jewish coffee farmers in that African nation band together to form the Delicious Peace Coffee Co-operative. They attract the attention of a Jewish coffee distributor in the United States, who's impressed by their organic/fair-trade beans. Much of the action centres around a hard-working Jewish farmer who gets the co-operative up and running.

Sheppard Cinema 3 on Friday, April 12 at 1 p.m. and Royal Ontario Museum on Monday, April 15 at 1 p.m.

Epilogue, an Israeli feature film by Amir Manor, focuses on Berl and Hayuta Hoz, an ailing and financially pressed elderly couple who fend for themselves in their twilight years. They live together in a modest flat in Tel Aviv, but spend their days virtually alone in near solitary isolation.

Berl, vigorous of mind, visits a relative in hospital and tries to start a mutual aid society for needy families. Hayuta buys medication and goes to a movie. Tears roll down her cheeks as she speaks to her son on the phone. He lives in New York City.

Manor succeeds in drawing a potent portrait of the ravages that afflict seniors.

Sheppard Cinema 5 on Wednesday, April 17 at 6 p.m. and Innis Town Hall on Thursday, April 18 at 4:45 p.m.

Jordan Satok's mobile program recommends relevant apps

David Silverberg

Few 19-year-olds see $1.8 million cheques written to the company they founded, but that's commonplace for Toronto resident Jordan Satok, who is one of the youngest entrepreneurs ever to raise venture financing.

Satok is deeply focused on his company AppHero, a smartphone app that helps you find other applications ideal for your interests. It personalizes the app discovery process, so if you say on Facebook you like marathon running, it'll seek to show you apps related to your passion for running. With your permission, AppHero accesses your Twitter and Facebook feeds to see what kinds of things you like, are talking about and are relevant to you.

For smartphone users, tools such as AppHero are helpful in sorting through the plethora of downloadable apps – 800,000 apps are available on Apple's App Store alone.

Satok says his love for software development can be traced back to when he was a young child who would spend time building with Lego blocks.

"If you like playing with things and making things, coding is a natural evolution of that," he says. By the time he was 13, he was programming websites and running a blog where he would talk about various apps, though at the time, it was computer software rather than apps for mobile devices. He would look at what he and his friends needed, and would build an app to help them. For example, when he wanted to work on time management for school, he would create a program that would do that.

He says he's always been fascinated by apps. You buy a new device, like a computer or phone, and out of the box, it doesn't do much, he says. Then you add software and it becomes really powerful.

With an office based in Toronto's Yonge Street and Eglinton Avenue area, Satok is all AppHero, all the time. Although he was given a full scholarship to the University of Waterloo the same year he was offered venture capital money, he chose to move straight from Upper Canada College to being a full-time entrepreneur.

"It's exciting," he gushes in a phone interview. "I get to work with some of the most amazing people in the world."

The people he works with range from about 25 to 35, but the fact that he's so much younger rarely poses a problem, he says. "We're a team. We make decisions as a team," he says, adding that he would never let his age stand in the way of his passion.

He says he's never wanted to go the "traditional" route of going to university, graduating, and finding a job in a company that matches your interest. That method, he said, won't necessarily find something that will truly feed your passion. "You have to go out into the world and meet people and start networking," he says.

Being part of the Jewish community has helped him meet people, which he credits to the "communal nature" of the religion. He says when he meets successful Jews, they're often willing to answer questions from a "mentorship perspective" and give him useful advice.

AppHero began two years ago, only a couple years after Satok created an App of the Day website. As a 15-year-old app fiend, he wanted to help smartphone users discover the apps useful to them, which is when the AppHero idea began to percolate.

It's a technically difficult challenge to see why a certain app works for you but not your friend, Satok explains. The complex algorithm in AppHero is constantly being tweaked and improved, evidenced by a 2.0 version recently released.

Investors have taken notice of Satok's determination to build an all-star app. In July, AppHero secured just under $1.8 million in seed financing from OMERS Ventures, Golden Venture Partners and ENIAC Ventures. "It's awesome to see investors taking a chance on me, seeing the value in what I'm doing," Satok says.

That was the biggest challenge at the beginning, he says. Having no degrees to his name, and just a little job experience, he was asking investors to have faith in him. However, his experience at a software company gave him the opportunity to prove himself to that team, and likewise to its investors, many of whom later invested in AppHero, he says.

AppHero is a smartphone app that helps you find other applications that interest you.

What's his day like? He'll engage in team meetings in the morning, discussing what the engineering crew needs to work on and what should be coded. Even though Satok doesn't have an engineering degree, he'll spend time at a terminal window, figuring out anything that needs to be fixed. He'll carve time out of his day to chat with AppHero users to gauge their response to the personalized service. He'll talk to media one week, or meet with investors in Boston another week. "No day is the same in my life," Satok admits.

Although some kids his age are going out to party and dating fellow students, Satok has no regrets about his chosen path. "This whole process is fun. I solve interesting problems. I work with smart people. I wouldn't change this for the world."

nina.shenhav@gmail.com

אני יושבת בבית הקפה ומשחקת לי עם הסלולארי החדש שלי. לא שאני אוהדת סלפונים בכלל, או את החדשני הזה בפרט, אבל אומרים שהוא הכי שיק וסטייל שיש, אז שיראו אותי שיקית וסטייליסטית. טלי מתיישבת מולי. "הזמנת כבר?" היא שואלת. "תורך להזמין, אז אולי מספיק עם ההתחמקויות הקמצניות שלך?" אני מגיבה. הסלולארי החדש מזמזם לו את העיקצוץ המעצבן ואני עושה את המנירות המתבקשות ועונה בהתנשפות כשבליבי רינה ודיצה.

אני (לסלפון): האלו? מה נשמע. (מקשיבה) לא, באמת. אז בגלל זה אתם מבטלים את הארוחה? זה יפריע למנוחת הכלב שלכם? טוב, פעם אחרת. ביי.

אני: סימה ואלי ביטלו את ההזמנה שלהם לארוחת ערב. מסתבר שהכלב שלהם פיתח שיעול אלרגי והם לא רוצים שנפריע, או משהו הגיוני לחלוטין שכזה.

אני (מוטרדת): לא, שתבין. זו כבר פעם שלישית שזה קורה לאחרונה. כל תורנהיל ודרומה לא סובלים אותי לאחרונה. נשבעת לך. ביטולים ופרצופים.

טלי: למה להצטנע? גם צפון לתורנהיל יש לך אויבים. מה עם ריצ'מונד-היל?

טלי: תמוה ביותר. מה דעתך אגב על הבנות שלי, גם אותן צריך לאבחן דחוף?

אני: אולי לא בדחיפות. זה סובל דיחוי. תגידי למה את אגרסיבית כלפי? זה בגלל שביטלתי את הפגישה השבועית שלנו? תביני, מאיר היה חייב להסתפר, ואני לא מרשה לו ללכת לספרית בלעדי. הוא לא רגיל ולא צריך להתרגל לאישה שעושה לו טוב... אפילו אם מעורב בעניין שמפו זול, מסטיק וצינור.

טלי: מעניין שהרגע ראיתי את מאיר יוצא מהקניון. הוא לא ניראה מסופר בכלל

אני: כן, הוא הסיע אותי לפה והלך. תגידי את מחזירה אותי הביתה, או שאת מעדיפה שאני אלך ברגל בקור ברוח ובסופה?

טלי: את יודעת את התשובה, אבל כבר הבטחתי למאיר שאני מחזירה אותך... ואגב, כדאי שתלמדי לכבות את הסלולארי החדש שלך!! שומעים כל מה שאת אומרת אחרי השיחה. ואני מצטטת: "אתה שומע מאיר, הברזתי לטלי. אמרתי לה שאני הולכת איתך להסתפר. אין לי כוח היום לבהמה המטומטמת הזאת!"

INA GARTEN'S BEST CHOCOLATE CAKE EVER

The buttermilk makes the cake incredibly moist

The Josh committee

The following is the job of our entire community. Please post.

All of us have to work to find a "forever home" for a 10-year-old Jewish boy, whom we'll call Josh. OK? Please, consider yourself part of a committee, which we'll call the Josh committee, an entity that cannot be disbanded until this child has what you and I have – a "forever family."

I think that's fair.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

For two years, Jewish Family & Child (JF&Cs) has worked arduously to find this enthusiastic, handsome and intelligent child a home. Throughout that time, Josh has been in two foster homes. Both have given the little guy outstanding marks for behaviour, ability to love and to be an integral part of a family.

But foster parents, God bless them, are not forever. It is therefore up to us, the Josh committee, to get Josh adopted. So what's the challenge? After all, according to adoptioncanada.ca, there are 40 qualified couples for every infant placed for adoption and only two per cent of children born are put up for adoption.

The tough thing is, Josh is 10 years old, and according to JF&CS professionals, many Jewish families want to adopt children but look for babies. OK, so Josh is 10. What's the worry?

Well, he doesn't have a "forever home," so he can be somewhat insecure. There are some medical issues, but nothing insurmountable. It's more expensive to adopt a 10-year-old, for sure, but the government and JF&CS have adoption subsidies to assist Josh's "forever parents," should they need it.

Basically, people figure because Josh is 10, he'll come with a whole set of problems. I haven't met Josh, but those warriors at JF&CS assure me he's nothing less than "delicious." I believe them.

I believe our committee's mission statement of finding a "forever home" for our fellow community member is holy. Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, the director of the Jewish educational organization Nishma (www.nishma.org), told me that while Josh is not an orphan, he is to be taken care of like one. That's a big deal. This imperative, to embrace the orphan, is repeated throughout the Torah many times as in, "You shall not cause pain to any widow or orphan." Exodus 22:21.

Further, according to Judaism, an adopted child is considered a full-fledged family member, and he/she is duty bound in the laws of death and mourning in the event of lost parents. In essence, by adopting Josh, by making him family, you are finding your son.

Remember when you read: Anne of Green Gables, Tom Sawyer, David Copperfield, Little Men, Oliver Twist, Pollyanna, and the story of Wart in The Once and Future King? Do you recall how your heart opened for those children without parents and how you just wanted to take them home and hold them?

That's Josh!

So, if you've considered adopting a child or you know someone in your contact list trying to make a family, call them and tell them you're on the Josh committee. Let them know they can learn more about this "delicious" community member by contacting Marsha Urowitz at JF&CS at 416-638-7800, ext. 6306.

The Josh committee will report back to you through this column. Make Josh your son. Find him a "forever home." Maybe it's yours.

Josh is "friendly, charismatic, loving and inquisitive. His smile and big blue eyes are hard to resist." – Sheryl Ederman, practice team manager, JF&CS

Israel's Chief of Staff, Benny Gantz, stands next to the ovens in one of the crematoria at Auschwitz-Birkenau. He led the March of the Living as part of the group from Israel that participated this year. It was the first time that an Israeli chief of staff led the march. [Flash 90 photo]

'Jewish blood will never be abandoned'

Israeli chief of staff leads March of the Living

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

OSWIECIM, Poland — Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Benny Gantz led Monday's March of the Living ceremonies at Auschwitz-Birkenau, along with Tel Aviv Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, himself a child survivor of the camp.

Some 10,000 participants made the three-kilometre walk on Monday afternoon.

Delivering a recorded message to participants, Israeli President Shimon Peres said his country would not forget the pain of the Holocaust, continuing a theme from his speech at the state's official ceremony the night before.

"It is not a matter of remembering or forgetting – their blood flows in our blood, boiling till this day," Peres said. "We will not be calmed. The distance is not that big. It happened 74 years ago, it is part of our biography, not part of our history."

Peres said the Jewish population of the world has not recovered from the Holocaust, and its numbers are still fewer than they were on the eve of World War II.

"The pain, the wound, the lacking is still there," he said. "They live inside us. We live from what happened to them."

Gantz arrived in Poland on Sunday, and declared that the State of Israel will ensure that the horrors of Auschwitz never happen again. Gantz, whose mother is a Holocaust survivor, was accompanied by a delegation of IDF officers and bereaved families of soldiers.

"The Nazis' successors are numerous. They stick by their anti-semitic ways and plot to create a modern Auschwitz," Gantz told an assembly at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem earlier in the week. "The IDF stands against intentions to wipe out the State of Israel, and we have sworn that Jewish blood will never be abandoned."

This year marked the first time that an IDF chief of general staff led the march. The annual program brings tens of thousands of high school students from around the world for a week of intensive education and touring in Poland and Israel to study the history of the Holocaust and examine the roots of prejudice, intolerance and hate. To date, more than 180,000 students have participated. The journey culminates in Israel, where participants honour Israel's fallen soldiers on Yom Hazikaron and celebrate Israel's Independence on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

JNF To Fete Brott

HAMILTON, Ont. — This year's Hamilton JNF Negev Dinner will honour conductor Boris Brott and his wife, Ardyth. Boris Brott, 69, is founder and artistic director of the National Academy Orchestra of Canada, the country's only professional training orchestra, and the Brott Music Festival, Canada's largest orchestral festival. Both are based in Hamilton. Ardyth Brott has been the festival's executive director for the past 25 years. The 61st annual dinner is June 2.

Gay Jews To Meet

WINNIPEG — Some 200 people are expected for a conference of gay and lesbian Jews July 5-7, when Winnipeg becomes the first Canadian city to host such an event. The 21st World Conference of GLBT Jews is presented by the World Congress of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender Jews, which has 50 member groups in North America, Europe and Argentina. Local sponsors include Anakhnu Jewish GLBT Group, the Rady Jewish Community Centre, Congregation Shaarey Zedek and Temple Shalom.

Rabbi Honoured

TORONTO — City Shul founder and CJN columnist Rabbi Elyse Goldstein was named one of "America's Most Inspiring Rabbis" by the Forward newspaper last month. The 36 rabbis on the list come from all the major denominations and were nominated by readers in response to a call from the New York-based publication. Rabbi Goldstein, 58, was ordained at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 1983. In 1991, she founded Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto.

Miliband Resigns

LONDON — Britain's Jewish former foreign secretary resigned from the board of a soccer club after the team appointed a coach who gave a Nazi-style salute at a game in Rome. Italian Paolo Di Canio, who was appointed head coach of the Sunderland team March 31, is a self-described fascist and admirer of fascist leader Benito Mussolini. David Miliband resigned March 31 as the vice-chair of the English soccer club. "I wish Sunderland AFC all success in the future," Miliband said. "However, in the light of the new manager's past political statements, I think it right to step down." Miliband left politics last month to head the New York-based International Rescue Committee, an aid organization. His brother, Ed, is head of Britain's Labour party and in line to be the next prime minister. The Miliband brothers are the sons of Polish Jewish immigrants.

Accident Kills Canadian-born Hillel Rabbi

PRINCETON, N.J. — Rabbi James Diamond, the Winnipeg-born, retired director of Princeton University's Center for Jewish Life, died in a traffic accident after leaving a breakfast study group.

Rabbi James Diamond

Rabbi Diamond, 73, who retired from the centre 10 years ago, was killed March 28 when a speeding car crashed into a parked car he was entering on the passenger side. The driver of the parked car, Rabbi Robert Freedman, who also attended the study group, was hospitalized. He is expected to recover from his injuries.

Rabbi Diamond was director of the Center for Jewish Life from 1995 to 2003. He was also executive director of Hillel at Washington University in St. Louis from 1972 to 1995, and at Indiana University from 1968 to 1972.

He taught courses in modern Hebrew literature and Judaic studies at Washington and Princeton universities, as well as in the Princeton community.

Rabbi Diamond, who was born and raised in Winnipeg, was ordained in 1963 by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. He was awarded a doctorate in comparative literature from Indiana University and was the author of many books.

Faith leaders unite to oppose Toronto casino

Rabbis join fellow clergy

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis, along with other groups of GTA faith leaders, has spoken out against the proposed Toronto casino.

Their statement, signed by more than 265 faith leaders, was released at an April 4 press conference at City Hall. It expressed opposition to the expansion of casinos proposed by the Ontario Lottery and Gaming Corporation, and support for NoCasinoToronto.com's anti-casino campaign.

The statement, which can be viewed online at nocasinotoronto.com (and on page 32), called on governments to "protect the most vulnerable in our society from casinos that exploit human weaknesses and addictions," and urged others to voice their opposition to expanded gambling.

"We are convinced that casinos contribute to family breakdown, depression, addiction, bankruptcies and crime," the document stated.

At the press conference, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, said that he and his colleagues were speaking "out of deep personal experience of individuals in our community who have been affected by excessive gambling."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Something of great moment

From the editor's desk...

Children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren have been born to the men and women who were young adults in 1948.

We, their children, look at the black-and-white photos they stashed in shoe boxes or in brown paper shopping bags, or pasted neatly in photo albums and try to imagine who our parents were when they were young, much younger even than we are today as we look at, inspect, examine and stare at the fading snapshots that are the little, precious pieces of our family's history.

Those young adults, in the full vigour of their strength and drive to establish a home and a family, would have likely had to pay around $8,000 for an "average" sized house in Canada. Their non-luxury car would have cost some $1,500 and they would have probably had a household income - if only one of the spouses was working which, of course, was the norm rather than the exception in 1948 – close to $2,500.

Many, if not most, of the young Jewish Canadian men would have likely served in World War II, which ended only three years earlier. Canadian Jews enlisted in higher relative numbers than any other self-identifying ethnic group in the country to fight the Nazis. After World War II, many of those very same young men and women went to British-ruled Mandatory Palestine to fight for, help bring about and protect a sovereign Jewish state.

For the vast majority of Jews on Earth in 1948, the establishment of a Jewish state was the very breath they breathed in personal relevance and communal commitment.

No cause was more urgent.

No cause was more important.

No cause more clearly, more poignantly, more emphatically spoke to the rest of the world on behalf of those young adults – our parents – of what it meant to be a Jew and a humane, caring, justice-seeking human being in 1948. They had neither the time nor the inclination to try to "understand the meaning" of events in Europe from 1933 to 1945.

They did what they could, wherever they were, to ensure the tiny, nascent Jewish state would live.

War had effectively been launched against the Jews of Palestine after Nov. 29, 1947, when the United Nations voted to partition Mandatory Palestine into two states: one for the Jews and one for the Arabs. The weight of international opinion was that the Jewish community in Palestine would not survive the impending onslaught of the combined regional Arab armies. Indeed the State Department of the United States was actively trying to undo the partition vote. The situation seemed bleak, if not hopeless for the courageous handful of Jews in Palestine.

In his autobiography, the inimitably eloquent Abba Eban, the head of Israel's delegation to the UN in 1948, deftly captured the mood of the times.

"The first stages of the war seemed to bode ill for Israel's cause. The danger came from the north, where Syrian Lebanese, Iraqi and Jordanian armies planned to move on Haifa and capture its port and refineries. Meanwhile, the Egyptians attacked along the coast while the remnants of the Arab Liberation Army harassed Jerusalem and assaulted Jewish settlements in the rest of the country. And the ring was growing tighter around the new city of Jerusalem."

The gritty defenders of the Jewish state repulsed the attackers from the north and from the south. But they could not save the Jewish quarter of the Old City. The Jordanian army captured the Old City, expelled the Jews, destroyed the synagogues and desecrated the countless markers and vestiges of Jewish life in Jerusalem. For the first time in more than a millennium, the Jewish presence in the ancient city of Jerusalem ceased to exist. That presence, however, would be once again restored 17 years later in 1967.

It is vital that we recall to mind these events of "merely" 65 years ago.

It is more vital still, to recall them to the minds of our children and they, in turn, to their children.

We must ensure that those events of 65 years ago and the very long line of events, of which they were part and which provide historical and theological context, repose deeply and forever in the collective memory of our people.

Dry Bones

On the fifth day of Iyar 1948 (May 14/15), the Jewish People proclaimed their right to our own state. It was a variation of the theme enshrined by the psalmist who wrote, "We shall not die, but live."

"The hour of choice had come and it had been seized," Eban wrote. "No matter what ensued, something of great moment had been enacted of which future Jewish generations would never cease to speak and dream."

For all time.

Solemn ceremony recalls victims of Shoah

Frances Kraft

An estimated 1,500 people gathered April 7 for Toronto's community Holocaust commemoration, said to be the largest of its kind outside of Israel.

The solemn program, which also commemorated the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, took place for the first time at the new Schwartz-Reisman Centre on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont. The morning event was co-sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Yom Hashoah

Keynote speaker Amek Adler, a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, Auschwitz-Birkenau and Dachau, said that, contrary to popular perception, Jews did fight back. "We fought every day and every night, every minute and every hour to be alive and to survive."

He said it is hard to describe the shock of seeing the ghetto for the first time at age 11 in 1939, when he arrived with his parents, grandparents and older brother. His father and brother later perished in Dachau.

"The situation was impossible," an emotional Adler said of the ghetto, recalling dead bodies lying in the street, people selling personal belongings in order to buy necessities on the black market and living on food rations of 180 calories per person per day. The Polish population, in contrast, received 2,300 calories per day, he said.

He remembers being beaten until he blacked out for refusing to take his hat off for a Nazi. Another time, a member of the Hitler Jugend (Youth) hit a friend of Adler's with no provocation. Adler jumped on the attacker, hit his head against the asphalt, and would probably have killed him had onlookers not stopped him, he said.

"Three hundred thousand men, women and children were taken from Warsaw and shipped to Treblinka, where life expectancy was one to one-and-a-half hours," he said. To prevent a repeat of the Holocaust, he stressed, "we must keep Israel strong."

DJ Schneeweiss, consul general of Israel to Toronto and Western Canada, said one of the fundamental reasons for Israel's existence is to ensure a calamity such as the Shoah never occurs again.

Israel owes survivors an immeasurable debt, Schneeweiss said. The Israeli government has just announced a 50-million shekel increase in assistance to survivors, he added.

He said it's a source of great strength for Israel "to always see Canada by our side, indeed often taking the lead," in the global fight against antisemitism and anti-Israel initiatives. He thanked Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government for its support.

Other participants included Louis Greenbaum, co-chair of the 2013 Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah steering committee; cantors Avraham Sultan and Tibor Kovari; violinist Ori Solomon; rabbis Chaim Strauchler and Micah Streiffer; March of the Living alumna Rebecca Aziza, General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion and Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post. Representatives of NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth), the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Hillel of Greater Toronto, Bnei Akiva Schools and March of the Living did readings as six commemorative candles were lit by army veterans, Shoah survivors and the granddaughter of the late Julia Ciurko, a recipient of Yad Vashem's designation as Righteous Among the Nations.

Community unity urged

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A show of solidarity with Israel from Diaspora communities is particularly resonant in the Jewish state when it occurs on Yom Hazikaron.

That's the message DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, wants to convey to the community.

As such, he's asking Toronto area Jews and ex-pat Israelis to come together again this year to commemorate Yom Hazikaron.

Building on the successes of past events, Schneeweiss told The CJN in a recent interview that he believes both communities will turn out en masse again this year to honour Israelis who have served their country and paid dearly, sometimes with their lives, for its protection and survival.

Yom Hazikaron

DJ Schneeweiss

This year's consulate-sponsored Yom Hazikaron event, a memorial ceremony for the fallen soldiers and victims of terrorism, will take place at Congregation Beth Tzedec at 7 p.m. on Sunday April 14. Doors will open at 6:15 p.m. to allow for security screening.

According to 2012 Israel statistics, since the state's founding in 1948, some 22,993 Israeli soldiers and victims of terrorism have died, and there are 10,524 bereaved families, including 2,396 orphans and 4,992 widows.

The estimated numbers of wounded Israelis is 75,000, and nearly 100,000 Israelis are considered disabled army veterans.

When Diaspora Jewish communities acknowledge and partake in the sombre occasion, Schneeweiss said, it has a profound effect on Israelis.

It shows empathy for the hardships and sacrifices Israelis make daily for the future of the country, he said.

Diaspora communities have both "a tangible and intangible impact on Israel," he said.

"The occasion marks a sense of belonging together and [the consulate's] role is to help enrich the Israel component here."

Jewish communities could not thrive as they do without a strong and secure Israel, he said. And while celebrating happier holidays such as Yom Ha'atzmaut also helps to "enrich and empower" Israel in the international community, days such as Yom Hazikaron are "less accessible" Schneeweiss said.

"That's why it's so important to try to build a bridge towards greater involvement in this part of Israel," he said.

"It's not just about heroism... it's about the sacrifices the families also make. Israelis are always 'on the line.' And there's a permanent preparedness that's quintessentially Israeli," he said.

And when Canadian and other pro-Israel communities pay respects to Israelis on Yom Hazikaron, the message resounds in the Middle East.

"It resonates throughout Israeli media, its blogosphere... [for Israelis] to know that there are people who understand them" allows Israelis to feel a sense of "shared fate."

The Israeli sense of being understood in the Diaspora is especially amplified when it comes to the Canadian community, Schneeweiss said.

"The confluence of values between Canada and Israel... is something which is unique," he said. "The story of Israel is something that is part of the unity, strength and thriving nature here. I'm not sure I could say the same thing if I was sitting in an Israeli consulate in America. We need communities like Canada to set an example and stand up for Israel."

Yom Hazikaron, more than other times, is a prime occasion to be moved and uplifted by the "great national project of this era: Israel," he said.

A remarkable country

Sixty-five years ago, at a restaurant in New York in late April, Alexandre Parodi, the first ambassador of France to the United Nations, asked Chaim Weizmann: "How can a few hundred thousand of you stand up against millions?"

The veteran French diplomat was referring to the situation in Mandatory Palestine. The Jews there were expected in a matter of days to proclaim a sovereign state of their own. That proclamation, in turn, was expected to unleash an onslaught of surrounding Arab armies determined to render the new Jewish state stillborn.

It was to this imminently unfolding reality that Parodi, aghast at the renewed possibility of the wholesale slaughter of Jews, aimed his question.

Echoing the words of our ancient sages, the 74-year-old scientist/statesman, who would be appointed Israel's first president, answered Parodi quickly: "Numbers were not decisive."

Israel suffered enormous casualties in its war of survival against the attacking Arab armies. Fully one per cent of its 600,000 people were killed in the fighting. But Weizmann proved to be correct.

The vastly larger enemy armies were repulsed.

In his typically magisterial manner, British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks explained the ethereal significance of the birth of the State of Israel.

"There have been moments [of modern Jewish history] – especially in relation to the State of Israel – that can only be compared with the wonders of the Bible. Perhaps we are too close to be able to see their miraculous character. One day, though, historians will look back at the second half of the 20th century and wonder at how a people that in the Holocaust had come face to face with the angel of death responded by reviving a land, recovering its sovereignty, rebuilding Jerusalem, rescuing threatened Jews through the world, and proving itself as courageous in pursuit of peace as in defending itself in war."

The dream of the Jewish state at peace with its neighbours has not yet been realized. Nor is the state without difficult, complicated, societal flaws. But next week, on the fifth day of Iyar, let us take a moment to reflect upon the miraculous character of the state's birth. Let us joyfully and gratefully celebrate the 65th anniversary of this remarkable, tiny state.

We cannot help but believe that the miracles of modern Jewish history and especially in relation to the State of Israel are ongoing, even if we do not always see them.

Thus, let us commit and recommit, to help make those miracles more evident to ourselves and to an increasingly hostile world, or in the words of its Declaration of Independence, "to rally round" and "stand by" the State of Israel in its ongoing efforts to achieve peace and to create a more perfect society.

The Jewish people's "age-old dream" is not yet fully realized. But we have not lost our hope.

'Sticks' needed to preserve Francophone heritage

Columnist Gil Troy's comparison of the Péquiste approach in preserving Quebec's national identity with Israel's approach is unbalanced ("What the PQ's Bill 14 teaches us about Israel," March 21). Many laudable parallels exist between Quebec and Israeli societies, but there are differences, which in Quebec have necessitated safeguards to the French language and Quebec culture, promulgated by Bill 101 and, arguably, Bill 14.

Israeli culture and the Hebrew language are not under assault in the Middle East, but Israel's existential survival as a Jewish state is. That context precipitates discussions on the legitimacy of the occupation and other perceived "excesses" of Israeli policies toward Palestinians, and indeed Israel's very right to exist.

Francophone Québécois have never faced the threat of physical extinction. But Quebec is surrounded by an English-speaking sea, so it's not difficult to understand the cultural fate threatening the province. If we continue to regard our Francophone Québécois heritage as worth preserving, we have to deploy sticks as well as carrots.

Jewish distrust of xenophobic nationalist movements is understandable, considering how often Jews were not only excluded but also victimized by them. In 1976, guided by communal traumas of the past, many Jews left Quebec. Today, our challenge as Jews ought to be not only to embrace the language, the vitality and the richness of an inclusive Quebec, but also to demonstrate that these distinctive qualities of Quebec culture bond us by common values and aspirations to those of the State of Israel.

Péquistes and Palestinians

Columnist Gill Troy, in looking at Bill 14, should be comparing Quebec with the Palestinians, rather than with Israel ("What the PQ's Bill 14 teaches us about Israel," March 21). The Palestinians look to destroy anything Jewish. Witness what they did when Israel evacuated Gaza and left certain structures intact. They were destroyed because they were built by Jews. So the Péquistes have and will continue to destroy anything that has Anglo origins.

Maimonides doesn't reject all supernaturalism

Rabbi David Hartman's essay has some interesting points, but I don't know why he jumped on what increasingly has become the bandwagon, and, at least by implication, attributing opinions to Maimonides that he was clearly opposed to ("Passover: a fine-tuning of the human soul," March 21).

Maimonides does not reject all supernaturalism. He is quite clear that God performed miracles, including those in the Passover story. He subscribes to the idea that both nature and supernatural miracles are God's actions. He, furthermore, doesn't reject messianism or the resurrection of the dead. Both, in fact, are included in his basic 13 articles of faith. Possibly most telling, Maimonides spells out quite clearly what should be related to fulfil the commandment of telling the Passover tale. It is that we were slaves in Egypt, oppressed by Pharaoh, that God had mercy, performed miracles, and took us out – precisely the view that Rabbi Hartman was disappointed with. The Passover story is filled with all kinds of meanings, including important messages of human freedom and responsibility, but let's not throw the baby out with the bathwater and claim that that's all there is. And, with all due respect, let's not be intellectually dishonest to make a point, and try to promote the idea that simply because Maimonides was a radical he would promote any radical opinion.

Iranian warships dock in Sri Lanka

I hope you are aware of the genocide of Tamils in Sri Lanka in 1983, and again in 2009, when more than 150,000 Tamils were massacred. Banned weapons like cluster bombs and chemical weapons were used to wipe out thousands of lives, including infants, children, women, elderly, wounded, etc. These internationally banned weapons were delivered to Sri Lanka from India, China and Pakistan. Sri Lanka is a friendly nation of Iran, Libya and Syria. We Tamils request your help to protect the Tamils in Sri Lanka. It was reported on March 22 that two Iranian warships, on which Iranian troops were on board, arrived at the Port of Colombo in Sri Lanka.

Israel's Declaration of Independence

Israel celebrates the 65th anniversary of its founding next week.

In commemoration of the anniversary, we reproduce the declaration read by David Ben-Gurion, chair of the Jewish People's Council, at the Tel Aviv Museum on May 14, 1948, the day that Britain's mandatory rule over Palestine ended. The council approved the proclamation declaring the establishment of the State of Israel.

The new state was recognized that night by the United States, and three days later, by the U.S.S.R. Ottawa conferred de facto recognition of Israel seven months later in December 1948 and de jure recognition in May 1949 once the Jewish state was admitted to the United Nations.

Eretz Yisrael – the Land of Israel, Palestine was the birthplace of the Jewish People. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books.

After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their Dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades, they returned in their masses. Pioneers, ma'pilim [Hebrew for immigrants coming to Eretz Yisrael in defiance of restrictive legislation] and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns, and created a thriving community controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodor Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish People to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognized in the Balfour Declaration of Nov. 7, 1917, and reaffirmed in the Mandate of the League of Nations, which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish People and Eretz Yisrael and to the right of the Jewish People to rebuild its national home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish People – the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing in Eretz Yisrael the Jewish state which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish People the status of a fully privileged member of the comity of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi Holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz Yisrael, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a life of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In World War II, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of freedom- and peace-loving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the peoples who founded the United Nations.

On Nov. 29, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael. The General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael to take such steps as were necessary on their part for the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish People to establish their state is irrevocable.

This right is the natural right of the Jewish People to be masters of their own fate, like all other nations, in their own sovereign State.

Accordingly, we, members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael and of the Zionist movement, are here assembled on the day of termination of the British Mandate over Eretz Yisrael and, by virtue of our natural and historic right and on the strength of the resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael, to be known as the State of Israel.

WE DECLARE that, with effect from the moment of the termination of the Mandate being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th of Iyar, 5708 (May 15, 1948), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the state in accordance with the constitution which shall be adopted by the elected constituent assembly not later than the Oct. 1, 1948, the People's Council shall act as a provisional council of state, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the provisional government of the Jewish state, to be called 'Israel.'

THE STATE OF ISRAEL will be open for Jewish immigration and for the ingathering of the exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace as envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the holy places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Charter of the United Nations.

THE STATE OF ISRAEL is prepared to co-operate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of Nov. 29, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz Yisrael.

WE APPEAL to the United Nations to assist the Jewish People in the building-up of its state and to receive the State of Israel into the comity of nations.

WE APPEAL – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the upbuilding of the state on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

WE EXTEND our hand to all neighbouring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of co-operation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish People settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in a common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East.

WE APPEAL to the Jewish People throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz Yisrael in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing our trust in the 'Rock of Israel,' we affix our signatures to this proclamation at this session of the Provisional Council of State, on the soil of the homeland, in the city of Tel Aviv, on the Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708 (May 14, 1948).

In whose home should charity begin?

Charity begins at home – so goes the saying. But what is charity, and where is home? Must the two always be in alliance?

These aren't theoretical questions. In an economy marked by shrinking resources, many people think about the ethics of prioritizing: how to divide a finite pie, rather than how to pour from a perpetual font. As a culture with a strong philanthropic tradition, we associate the English word "charity" with the Hebrew word tzedakah. However, the words have different roots. Tzedakah is linked with the word tzedek, or justice. The linguistic connection suggests to us that the giving of tzedakah is not an optional add-on, done out of the goodness of our hearts, but something mandatory and restorative.

The word "charity" comes to us from the Latin caritas, connoting dearness, affection and love. This suggests that we give because we feel compassion and esteem for the other. The two ideas, of course, are not incompatible. Empathy or affection may, indeed, be the impetus to do right by others. But they have somewhat different implications, especially when brought to bear on the idea that charity ought to begin at home.

The saying has been invoked to mean different things, ranging from a call to social justice to a justification for selfishness. It's sometimes used cynically to justify husbanding one's resources only for oneself or one's immediate family, and ignoring the needs of others. Others place the phrase in a different context, relying on the Latin roots of "charity" as love: one's affections are most properly directed to one's family, and should not stray afield. In popular psychology, people use the saying to suggest that until you love yourself, you cannot love others.

A saying with secular currency, the idea that charity begins at home also resonates with Judaism and with other religious traditions. The Talmud (Bava Metzia) enjoins that we prioritize our giving, taking care first of the poor in our families, then in the town in which we live, then in our country, and always of the Jewish community. Care thus radiates out in concentric circles, with the giver as the centre point.

In these different contexts, "home" may be understood spatially (your town, your country), communally (the Jewish people), emotionally (your family), and psychologically (yourself). In fact, these continue to be the ordering principles that most people either consciously or intuitively conform to when giving. But, increasingly, in a world where gaps of distance may be condensed by technology, with the far brought near, "home" takes on expanded meaning, and it becomes less simple to determine the chain of charitable commitments.

I know many Jewish families who actively engage in questions about giving. For example, what percentage of giving should be reserved for Jewish causes, and what percentage directed outside the Jewish community? Should causes in Israel have greater claim than poverty right there in our Canadian cities and towns? After all, in our urban home, we see poverty, homelessness, joblessness, abuse and violence around us. But Israel, too, we feel to be a home.

And how should we incorporate the repeated injunctions in our tradition to use our historical experiences of slavery and persecution as a basis of ethics toward the other – those whose "home" may not be ours? For many, the 20th-century Jewish survival of genocide impels us to engage with other genocides, sometimes in places we have no personal connection to.

We shouldn't conceptualize the giving of tzedakah only as whipping out a chequebook. Giving of ourselves – our time, our human labour, our mentorship – also belongs under that rubric. As individuals and in organized groups, people volunteer at local kitchens and shelters, travel to places such as Rwanda and other locales ravaged by genocide, or rebuild homes in areas decimated by storms. In effect, where you put your own body creates a kind of "home" – an unfamiliar place that becomes familiar, a group of strangers who become like family.

Perhaps we could think of the saying "Charity begins at home" as connoting not where we direct funds, but where the impulse to give must originate – in one's self, one's family and one's community.

The Pope, the Jews and Judaism

"Any time a new pope is named, the Jewish community regards him with skepticism" wrote staff writer Marc Tracy in the New Republic recently. In summing up the achievements of the two previous heads of the Catholic Church, Tracy noted that both had affirmed that antisemitism is incompatible with Christianity and that the State of Israel has legitimacy.

Jews hope that the next incumbent will continue in the same vein. There were concerns about the cardinal from Honduras who was one of the frontrunners for the job. Canadian journalist Christine Williams wrote about him that "this outspoken antisemite reportedly blamed the Jews for deflecting attention away from 'Israeli injustices against the Palestinians' by arranging for the media to give undue attention to the Catholic sex abuse scandal."

Rabbi Dow Marmur

in Toronto

Therefore, the election of Pope Francis was greeted with relief and enthusiasm throughout the Jewish world. Already the day after the announcement, a photograph was circulated showing the new Pope celebrating Chanukah in Buenos Aires, where he had been archbishop.

It was also reported that he visited another synagogue on Rosh Hashanah and that he hosted a memorial event on the anniversary of Kristallnacht. And he had shown solidarity with the Jewish community after the 1994 bombing of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires. In his forward to a book by prominent Argentine rabbi Sergio Bergman, he described the author as "one of my teachers."

The news media cited Jewish interfaith activists praising the new Pope. Thus Rabbi David Rosen of the American Jewish Committee described him as a "warm and sweet and modest man." Abe Foxman of the Anti-Defamation League and Rabbi Marvin Hier of the Simon Wiesenthal Center expressed their enthusiasm in superlatives. The headline of a large article in Israel's leading daily Ha'aretz read: "Francis is good for the Jews."

As soon as he was appointed, the new Pope invited the Chief Rabbi of Rome to his inaugural mass at the Vatican and wrote: "I sincerely hope to be able to contribute to the progress that relations between Jews and Catholics have enjoyed since the Second Vatican Council." Israeli President Shimon Peres hastened to invite the new Pope to Israel, stating that Vatican-Jewish relations are "now at their best in the last 2,000 years."

The suggestion that Pope Francis may not have done enough to protect the more than 30,000 victims of Argentina's Dirty War between 1976 and 1983, when he was a prominent church leader in his country, were vehemently denied by a Vatican spokesperson. In the Pope's defence, he stated that "there have been many declarations of how much he did for many people to protect them from military dictatorship."

But as much as Pope Francis may have reached out to Jews, it's nevertheless legitimate to ask about the attitude of the Catholic Church he now heads to Judaism.

Though the charge of Jewish deicide has been dropped, and the traditional teaching that Christianity has superseded Judaism and thus rendered it irrelevant, even harmful, is no longer openly promulgated, the limits of the relationship between the Catholic – i.e., universal and comprehensive – religion and the faith of Israel can probably never be viewed by the former as symmetrical.

One of the most prominent theologians of interfaith dialogue, the late Krister Stendahl, a former dean of Harvard Divinity School and Lutheran Bishop of Stockholm, wrote in a celebrated essay on religious pluralism that "universalism is the ultimate arrogance in the realm of religion" because it's "by definition and unavoidably spiritual colonialism, spiritual imperialism."

In Rev. Stendhal's view, true interfaith understanding must affirm that "in the eyes of God, we are all minorities." Those who claim "catholic" universal truth may choose to be tolerant of others, but that's not enough. Tolerance, he wrote, has by its very nature "an elitist lining," either because the other doesn't matter too much or out of civil noblesse oblige.

The likelihood of the Vatican telling its 1.3 billion adherents that they're in any sense a minority is difficult to imagine. Therefore, as much as we've reason to applaud the positive statements by the new Pope, we cannot forget that he heads a curia that – unlike the many liberal Catholic individuals and groups it has been my privilege to know and work with – may regard Judaism as inferior.

Therefore, even allowing for good intentions, potential claims of domination still make true co-operation with the Vatican problematic.

Iraq: 10 years after the war

American forces roared into Baghdad 10 years ago this month, virtually completing the three-week invasion of Iraq and toppling one of the most repressive Arab regimes in the Middle East.

In a crowning touch heavily laden with symbolic implications, U.S. troops helped rapturous Iraqis tear down a towering and glowering statue of Iraq's dictator, Saddam Hussein, in the heart of the city. Few Iraqis outside ruling Baathist party circles were unhappy that his regime had finally been overthrown.

A brutal autocrat who ruthlessly crushed his opponents and plunged Iraq into the long night of totalitarianism, he was a greatly disruptive force in the region, lending political and financial support to radical Palestinian factions bent on destroying Israel, meddling in the affairs of his Arab neighbours and sending armies to invade Iran and Kuwait in 1980 and 1990 respectively.

Saddam's eight-year war with Iran, which essentially ended in a draw, weakened Iraq. But Iraq's naked aggression in Kuwait was even more disastrous. The 1991 Gulf War, which broke out in reaction to Iraq's imperial designs on Kuwait, brought Iraq to its knees. As the United States assembled a coalition to push Iraq out of Kuwait, the United Nations imposed severe economic sanctions on Iraq and sent inspectors there to ensure that Iraq's weapons of mass destruction were disabled or destroyed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As Iraqis crowded around the statue in wonderment and amazement, perhaps reflecting on the disasters Saddam had inflicted on Iraq, Iraqi mobs ran amok in an orgy of looting, creating an indelible impression of unbridled anarchy. Watching these developments unfolding, the U.S. secretary of defence, Donald Rumsfeld, made a flippant observation that may haunt him for the rest of his days. As he said, "Stuff happens and it's untidy, and freedom's untidy, and free people are free to make mistakes and commit crimes and do bad things."

Little did he know that the United States had embarked on a risky military adventure – Operation Iraqi Freedom – that would cost it dearly in blood and treasure, divert resources from the war already raging in Afghanistan and diminish its international standing and prestige.

The victorious and largely unopposed American march into Baghdad on April 9, 2003, generated self-serving illusions in Washington that the war would soon end on a triumphant note and enable American soldiers to return back home.

With a spate of suicide bombings killing U.S. troops, and with an insurrection building, clear-eyed foreign correspondents covering the fighting drew a more sober conclusion. In a story published on the front page of the New York Times on April 12, Dexter Filkins presciently wrote, "But the fact is the war is not over."

Almost a decade would elapse before the Americans withdrew from Iraq. During the interval, 4,484 Americans lost their lives and 32,200 were wounded in a mission that would cost an estimated $3 to $4 trillion, a gargantuan sum that could have been used to battle poverty in urban ghettos, or establish a long overdue universal health-care system.

Donald Rumsfeld

George W. Bush, the U.S. president who launched the invasion, initially justified it on the basis of two rationales. Iraq's chemical, biological and nuclear weapons were a regional threat, while Iraq's relationship with Al Qaeda represented a clear and present danger.

When these claims turned out to be bereft of substance, Bush and his secretary of state, Colin Powell, adopted a different approach, claiming that the ouster of Saddam would usher in a new era of democracy in the Middle East and inspire a push for democratic reforms throughout the region.

Ten years on, with Saddam dead and buried, Iraq possesses the trappings and veneer of a parliamentary democracy. Elections have taken place and a constitution has been written.

But Iraq, riven by deep sectarian divisions pitting Shiites against Sunnis, has been thrown into chaos. The current prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, has been accused of concentrating power in his hands and marginalizing the Sunnis, the big losers in postwar Iraq.

The insurrection, which broke out as the Americans and their allies rolled into Iraq, is mainly an expression of Sunni anger and resentment with the new political order. Although the revolt is not as toxic as it was in its early phase, it continues to simmer and claim victims.

Since 2003, 110,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed in a variety of violent incidents. As the 10th anniversary of the invasion was marked in Iraq on March 19, 17 car bombs exploded throughout the country, killing some 60 civilians and wounding 190. Al Qaeda took responsibility for the bombings, underscoring its ability to sow mayhem in a war-weary nation struggling to regain its footing after so much bloodshed.

Oil production is back to 1990 levels of three million barrels a day, but power outages are still common. Once-scarce western consumer goods, embargoed by UN sanctions, are now widely available. But youth unemployment has reached appalling heights. A grasping nouveau riche elite has arisen to grab the spoils, but for the vast majority of Iraqis, relatively little has changed and life remains exceedingly difficult.

The Kurds, having established a semi-autonomous enclave in northern Iraq, were one of the chief beneficiaries of the war. But now that they enjoy a degree of independence just short of actual statehood, they have been thrust into an adversarial contest with the central government over control of Iraq's lucrative oil wealth.

The long-oppressed Shiite majority gained much from the American invasion. Sidelined by Britain, the colonial power in Iraq from World War I until 1932, the Shiites were repressed by a succession of Sunni-dominated Iraqi governments after the British left. Under Saddam, a Sunni, too, the repression worsened, particularly after Iraq crushed a Shiite uprising in southern Iraq in the immediate aftermath of the Gulf War.

The emancipation and empowerment of the Shiite community, a U.S. war objective, has produced noxious blowback. Saddam checked Iran's hegemonic ambitions, but with his removal, a worthy outcome of the war, Iran's influence in Iraq has never been stronger. Iran, a bastion of Shiite Islam, has forged cordial relations with the current Iraqi government as the volume of bilateral trade has increased significantly.

For Israel, the American invasion has turned out to be a mixed blessing.

The elimination of Saddam's regime was a strategic victory for Israel. Saddam allied himself with Israel's enemies and fired 39 Scud missiles into Israel during the Gulf War. But now that Iran has gained ascendancy in Iraq, Israel is faced with a serious strategic problem that may well grow worse in the future.

'Missing' Israeli teen in contact with parents

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An Israeli teenager who left a leadership exchange program visiting Toronto without permission is no longer considered missing.

The 16-year-old boy, Raphael Arega Tesfaye, has been in contact with his parents in Eilat, and they are confident he is well and in no danger, said Brian Keshen, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's vice-president of community capacity building, who supervised the exchange program.

"The family feels he's safe, with a friend. We haven't heard back directly, but he's been in contact with his family," Keshen said.

"They're following his lead."

The teenager, originally from Ethiopia, was in Toronto as a member of the Diller Teen Fellows, a Jewish leadership program that includes a visit to an overseas Jewish community where they meet and interact with other Diller Teen Fellows. The program is run under the auspices of the Jewish Agency For Israel, in partnership with the federation, along with other communities in North America and Israel.

Prior to arriving in mid-March for the 10-day visit, Arega Tesfaye had asked for permission to leave the group for a time. His request was turned down and midway through the trip, while at the Vaughan Mills shopping centre, he sneaked away. York Region police were informed, as was the Israeli Consulate.

Arega Tesfaye, who goes by the Facebook allas Rephael Bruk, subsequently contacted his parents and sister and indicated he'd meet up with the group as they prepared to return to Israel just before Passover. He did not.

In the last week, he's reached out to his parents two more times, Keshen said.

"His parents have expressed a great deal of confidence that he's with somebody that he's comfortable with and that he's safe. They know who it is," though that information has not been shared with people in Toronto.

Nevertheless, Keshen added, federation officials would like to contact Arega Tesfaye. "We remain worried as we would for someone who is truant at school, but the sense of risk has gone down. We'd like to help him as much as possible."

Federation remains in possession of Arega Tesfaye's luggage and passport, which contains a six-month visa, he said.

"We're still trying to reach out. His parents said they'd speak to him to tell him we're available to help. This is a very bright, innovative kid. I can't tell you what... he's feeling, fearing or searching for."

Arega Tesfaye's disappearance has not affected plans to send 10 youngsters from Toronto to Eilat this summer as part of the Diller program.

"The rest of the kids [from Israel] had an amazing experience and we're looking forward to our trip to Eilat this summer," Keshen said.

Bone marrow donor hosts his own drive

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

About two months ago, Michael Levin, 36, received a phone call that changed the life of someone he has never met.

The caller was from Gift of Life, a Florida-based Jewish bone marrow foundation, and said that Levin was a potential match for an anonymous recipient.

Levin, an investment banker who is married with three children, said he couldn't even remember being tested. "I realized, though, that eight years ago before my wife and I had children, I had given a swab when we went for genetic testing."

Based on the information Gift of Life had, he said, he was a 30 per cent match, which meant they wanted to do further testing.

"I took a blood test, and was told I would hear back in about eight to 12 weeks. [Surprisingly, I received word] in seven days that I was a very good match, and I was asked if I was prepared to go forward.

"When I said yes, they explained the risks, and then we had the task of scheduling where and when the donation would take place."

He chose New York City, he said, – if the recipient is American, the procedure has to be done in the United States – because his company has an office there, and he would be able to do some work.

Michael Levin and his wife Melissa

Gift of Life flew Michael and his wife, Melissa, to New York and accommodated them throughout the entire procedure, known as peripheral blood stem cell collection, which represents the majority of bone marrow donations, he said.

He was prepped for the donation for five days, he said, and on March 18, he spent several hours hooked up to a transfusion machine giving stem cells.

"It is important to tell my story, because I want people to know that donating bone marrow is not an intrusive process. I received shots for those first five days, which stimulated the production of stem cells, and then I was hooked up to a machine. A Gift of Life representative was with me the whole time."

He said that the only side effect from the procedure was some muscle ache, "as if I'd used muscles I hadn't used in a while."

Melissa, a Grade 1 teacher at Leo Baeck Day School, said, however, that emotionally, the procedure was overwhelming. "From the moment we got the phone call, we were overcome with emotions. We were told that the recipient was a 65-year-old woman, and we thought that Michael was hopefully saving the life of a mother and grandmother."

Levin said he would do the whole thing over again "without hesitation."

The Levins are now hosting a bone marrow drive on April 21 at Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto – a Thornhill location will be announced – for four-year-old Jayden Roll from Montreal, who was recently diagnosed with a rare form of leukemia.

"We would love to use this drive to bring awareness of the whole process," Levin said. "We want to stress that it can be done in a non-invasive way, and that drives are important for the recipient and for building a bank for the community. It is an important thing to do."

Chai Kosher set to close May 3

Marvid to increase supply

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Kosher consumers in Toronto will have plenty of chicken, despite the impending closure on May 3 of Chai Kosher Poultry, one of the city's largest suppliers, industry insiders say.

Moishe Friedman, president of Marvid Poultry in Montreal, said he supplies many kosher retailers in Toronto and has the ability to increase his company's capacity to 200,000 chickens a week if necessary.

"Consumers will have as many chickens as they need. There will be no shortage or price increase," he said.

Marvid Poultry carries hechshers from both the Montreal Jewish Community Council (MK) and the U.S.-based Orthodox Union (OU).

Chai representatives refused to comment about the company's demise after news about it had spread on social media over the weekend.

But industry sources said it had received an offer to buy the land where its plant is located, in the Port Lands area south of the Gardiner Expressway and near the eastern waterfront.

Richard Rabkin, director of marketing and business development for the Kashruth Council of Canada, which supervises Chai under the council's COR hechsher, said he values the Kashruth Council's longstanding relationship with Chai and regrets its closing.

He stressed, however, that Toronto will have a plentiful supply of kosher chicken.

"We are also looking into some alternative sources. Our main objective is for [kosher consumers] to have access [to what they need]," he said.

Florida police say robbery may have motivated double murder

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Police in Florida believe robbery may have been the motive behind the double murder of Toronto snowbirds Donny Pichosky and Rochelle Wise on Jan. 9.

Wise's wedding ring, valued at about $16,000, is missing. She was known to wear it all the time, Capt. Sonia Quinones of Hallandale Beach Police told CBS Miami.

Police Chief Dwayne Flournoy said in the same newscast that a robbery motive is the leading theory, but not the only one.

Detectives are appealing to pawn shop owners and jewelry exchange businesses to review their inventory and notify them if they have a ring like Wise's, which is approximately size 6-1/2, in a platinum finish, with five half-carat white diamonds on top in a half-moon shape.

As well, the ring may be engraved with the letters "DCC" inside the band, and it has a locking mechanism at the base to allow it to open and close to fit over a knuckle.

The police are also still trying to identify a woman who appeared outside the couple's Venetian Park condominium townhouse on a neighbour's surveillance video the day they were murdered. The video shows the woman carrying an item and walking to the rear of the house, then walking back to the front/side area of the house empty-handed.

Police are looking for Rochelle Wise's wedding band.

The footage can be seen on the police website, cohb.org.

Wise, 66, was a retired preschool administrator at Bialik Hebrew Day School and a founding director of Crestwood Valley Day Camp.

Pichosky, 71, her husband of four years, was a retired businessman who volunteered with seniors at Baycrest and had spent at least 20 years wintering in Florida.

The couple was found dead in their townhouse after failing to show up for a lunch date and not answering repeated phone calls. They died of asphyxiation, and there were at least two perpetrators, police revealed last month.

Crime Stoppers is publicizing a $51,000 (US) reward for information leading to an arrest in the case. The bulk of the reward – up to $50,000 – is being offered by anonymous donors. A reward poster specifies that Crime Stoppers does "not want your name, just your information."

Anyone with information about the homicide, the ring, or the identity of the woman in the video, is urged to call Crime Stoppers at 954-493-TIPS (8477) or 1-866-493-TIPS (8477), or Det. Lane Sauls at 954-457-1438, or to go to www.browardcrimestoppers.org.

CIJA working in a more competitive market

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf

Community Advocacy

Second of a two-part series

Is the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) an improvement over the old structure of Jewish community advocacy in Canada, or not?

CIJA's advantages and disadvantages have been a continuing source of debate since the organization dismantled Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and National Jewish Campus Life (Hillel's parent body) in 2011 while simultaneously assuming the older agencies' roles.

That change was criticized by community members who were loyal to Congress and lamented the destruction of the venerable 90-year-old organization.

However, supporters of CIJA say the new organization has done a lot of good in its two years of operation as the community's main advocacy agency and that it's too early to judge its work.

Maureen Appel Molot, distinguished research professor at Carleton University's Norman Paterson School of International Affairs, said the time was right for a shake-up of the old advocacy structure.

"No one likes change, so the quite dramatic changes… understandably generated angst in communities long accustomed to a particular way of doing things. In the one area to which I am particularly attentive – that of the campus – there have only been gains, and significant ones," she said.

Molot said CIJA has backed many "long-overdue, innovative programming" initiatives on campuses across Canada.

Some of those include launching Size Doesn't Matter, a pro-Israel, student-led public relations and marketing organization that often cheekily promotes the Jewish state across media platforms, and Buycott Israel, an anti-boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign devoted to encouraging the purchase of Israeli-made products.

Both of these programs have been so innovative that they've been adopted by American Jewish advocacy groups.

CIJA has also facilitated numerous Israel missions for Canadian academics.

"Sitting around the national community table many years ago, I was frustrated by the lack of clarity between the responsibilities of Congress and what was then the Canada-Israel Committee, and I felt the two organizations should be merged to facilitate the development of a more integrated Jewish agenda on national as well as Israel-related issues," she said.

"In my view, the creation of CIJA was a step forward for the national Jewish community as well as for its constituent federations/communities."

Jack Mintz, Palmer Chair at the University of Calgary's School of Public Policy, also noted some of the positives that CIJA brings to the community, but he believes the organization will have to fight harder than its predecessors to position itself as the community's primary representative advocacy body.

"I was involved in early discussions about why [the community] needed to do a significant restructuring" of the advocacy landscape, said Mintz, a former director of the Canadian Jewish Congress Museum and Archives.

"While I was with Congress, there was a fundamental flaw in advocacy, in that it dealt with all the domestic advocacy issues while the CIC was responsible for Israel advocacy. It seemed fundamentally wrong that these two [areas] were separable issues to be dealt with," Mintz said.

Maureen Appel Molot

"Antisemitism was also related to anti-Zionism" and to continue with a separation of duties between CJC and CIC made little sense, he said.

Mintz said he was a "strong proponent" of moving to a "more rational advocacy approach… one body to deal with those types of issues."

CIJA, he said, now brings all advocacy efforts under one roof "which I think is appropriate."

However, Mintz said he isn't sure how much CIJA's new advocacy efforts have penetrated the community's consciousness.

"The fact that I don't see very much being put forward with respect to social justice or policy issues says something about CIJA," he said. "In fact, the one concern I had with the new structure was dropping the name Canadian Jewish Congress, which had a brand out there. I thought it would be a problem, because CIJA was not known and wouldn't have the same cachet and would take time to built up a significant brand."

While he said he has read news reports about CIJA's advocacy related to Israel and antisemitism, Mintz said he hasn't seen as much ink about its "broader-based advocacy" on social policy.

Jack Mintz

Mintz said he doesn't see what CIJA is doing right now that makes it as "significant [a] player" in the social policy field as Congress was.

The Jewish community may have a less positive view of CIJA than it had of Congress, because CIJA appoints its own leaders while Congress' leaders were elected at national plenary conferences, he said.

Asked whether he felt CIJA's self-appointment of its leaders is problematic, Mintz said that Congress' plenary voting structure was democratic in theory, but in practice, there hasn't been much difference between the two methods.

The plenary format gave Congress the veneer of democracy, but "in the end, a lot of its officers were chosen by rubber stamp anyway. It wasn't as democratic as one thought," Mintz said.

Engaging with the broader Jewish community should be a priority for CIJA, or it risks losing a branding war with other community advocacy groups, he added.

"There has been a decline in the brand [of community advocacy] relative to earlier years, which CIJA will have to think hard about in order to really demonstrate they are a significant player in advocating and being the spokesman for the Jewish community. Otherwise, other organizations are going to come in and fill the gap."

Yom Hashoah 5773

From the Prime Minister

On Yom Hashoah, Canadians stand together to remember the countless innocent people, including the nearly six million Jewish men, women and children who suffered and died at the hands of the Nazis during the Holocaust.

As we mark the liberation of the first Nazi concentration camp in Buchenwald, Germany, let us also pay tribute to all those brave souls who fought with the Jewish resistance during this dark period, and let us renew our own commitment to continue their fight against all forms of intolerance, discrimination and antisemitism.

On March 5, Canada became the chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA). As chair, Canada is committed to an ambitious campaign to raise Holocaust awareness and fight antisemitism at home and abroad. Canada will host a major IHRA conference in October in Toronto.

The atrocities of the Holocaust betrayed the fundamental value of human dignity. We must never allow such unthinkable crimes to be forgotten or repeated.

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister

From the Premier of Ontario

On behalf of the government of Ontario, I am deeply honoured to join our province's Jewish community in observing Yom HaShoah.

It is only by remembering the heinous crimes of the Holocaust that we can strengthen our resolve to never let such a tragedy happen again. And it is by paying tribute to the Holocaust's victims and heroes – and by telling their individual stories – that we are reminded anew of the need to continue building a society based on mutual respect, acceptance and understanding.

For Ontarians of different faiths and backgrounds, Yom Hashoah is an opportunity to learn more about the immensity and meaning of the Holocaust – a time to reflect on the millions of innocent lives it claimed, the inspirational testimonies of its survivors and the obligation it has placed on all humanity to never remain silent in the face of injustice, intolerance and bigotry.

As Jewish Canadians mark Yom Hashoah, I encourage all Ontarians to rededicate themselves to the principles of a just and fair society.

Kathleen Wynne
Premier of Ontario

REMEMBERING THOSE WHO PERISHED: Baycrest clients, families, staff and volunteers observed Yom Hashoah April 7 at a service in the atrium of the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, commemorating the Holocaust with prayers, readings and music. Survivors and their families lit six candles to remember the six million Jews who died. Rosa Weisberg (left), a patient at Baycrest hospital, and her husband, Sam, both survivors, lit a candle in memory of friends and loved ones. The Yom Hashoah ceremony is hosted by Baycrest's Holocaust resource program.

CJC 'collapse' called a bad decision

The CJN contacted the community's two other main advocacy organizations – B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center Canada (FSWC) – to get their opinions about the new advocacy landscape.

B'nai Brith did not respond to requests for comment by The CJN's deadline.

Avi Benlolo, CEO and president of the FSWC, said his organization would be open to working with CIJA, as it had with Congress in the past, if the new body ever approaches it.

Avi Benlolo

"Our door is always open for discussion, provided it aligns with our strategic interest and is mutually respectful," Benlolo said.

The FSWC, he said, considers itself more of a "universal human rights organization" and is not strictly a Jewish community organ.

"We are not a replacement for CJC or any other Jewish entity," he said.

According to Benlolo, his organization counts some 30,000 members in Canada.

Benlolo said he believes it was a bad decision to "collapse" the CJC.

"It was effective and had a good name in the community. While we were not always in agreement, our relationship was very respectful and constructive. We valued each other's presence, and that helped facilitate advocacy efforts for the community. The void left by CJC has indeed created much more pressure for organizations like ours."

A lollipop that helps you lose weight

Viva Sarah Press
Israel21c.org

TEL AVIV — Willy Wonka may have the secret recipe for the Everlasting Gobstopper, but it's an Israeli candy company that is taking the confectionery and health-food world by storm with its new fortified sweets.

Carmit Candy Industries recently unveiled its original line of fortified confectionery products at the Natural Products Expo West industry event in Anaheim, Calif. The innovative lollipops, wafers and toffees are formulated to help shed pounds, boost the immune system and promote bone health.

"Healthier food, and the importance that diet has on health is a major consumer trend for many years," said CEO Steve Grun.

"Food manufacturers have been answering this trend with many new products, ranging from reduced fat/ sugar/ sodium products to products fortified with vitamins/ minerals/ fibre. We are taking this a step further by combining really tasty candy products with the most up-to-date nutrition ingredients to create products that taste great and deliver a specific health benefit."

From early on, Carmit did away with trans fat in its products. Grun told Israel21c that it was out of necessity in following Jewish dietary laws that the company became an unexpected leader in dairy-free, dietetic and organic confectionery.

"Carmit's gluten-free confectionery is a spinoff of products we developed for the kosher-for-Passover market, where the use of wheat flour is expressly prohibited. Our non-dairy products are a spinoff from the kosher need for pareve," Grun said.

The Israeli candy manufacturer hopes to lead the way with its fortified candy line as well. "This is a natural progression for us," he said. "The fortified confectionery market is a strategic direction for us, and we hope to further establish Carmit as a leading private-label manufacturer for value-added and healthy confectionery products."

The new products include a weight-management wafer bar with glucomannan and potato extract; chocolate coins with calcium, vitamin D and vitamin K; and sugar-free toffee chews with echinacea, vitamin C and zinc.

Grun explained that the added-value ingredients are selected for their scientific support, regulatory approval and technical parameters. Playing an equally important role are the candies and chocolates made in Carmit's two factories in Israel for the mainstream palate.

"Our customers are looking for new and innovative products – especially supplements that can be delivered in a tasty food format," said Adrian Sagman, Carmit's vice-president of export marketing and sales."

For more than 35 years, South African-Israeli Lenny Sackstein and his team have been creating colourful confectionery for the domestic and international markets.

In 1973, Sackstein opened a small duty-free shop at Ben-Gurion International Airport under the name Taste of Israel, selling dried fruits alongside sweets. Taste of Israel eventually bought the Carmit toffee brand-name from Ma'ale Hahamisha and expanded its products. In 1993, the family business went public and began to trade on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

Carmit Lollipops

Carmit is famous for its tri-coloured twisty marshmallows, chocolate coins with popping candies, colourful gummy drops, bright-coloured lollipops, gluten-free all-natural confectionery, yogurt-covered gluten-free pretzels and fruit-flavoured toffees. The company's best-loved treats in Israel are marketed under the brand Lenny's Magical Candies, which feature a colourful character sprinkling magic and candies everywhere he goes.

"It's the Israeli Willy Wonka," said Grun, except that the Israeli version is always happy and eager to put a smile on children's faces.

Carmit introduced the first marshmallow to Israel 25 years ago. In addition to the standard white-and-pink oval type, its specialty is shaped ones .

The company is also one of the biggest chocolate coin manufacturers in the world. "We have great partners all over the world selling our product. We're a very well-established private-label manufacturer," said Grun.

If you've ever eaten a chocolate coin in the United States, Europe, Australia or Canada, for example, the likelihood that it was made in Israel is extremely high.

Carmit's products are sold to well-known manufacturers, distributors and retail outlets in numerous international markets. Sales reach some $35 million a year. The Carmit name usually doesn't appear on the product, but there's no hiding where it was made.

"Our brand is sold all over the world, and on all of our products it says, 'Made in Israel' or 'product of Israel.' That's something we can be proud of," said Grun.

He said fortified candies will be the next big development in the industry, but that's not to say candy is healthful.

Reform rabbi reaching out to Israeli families

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Meir Azari – the former executive director of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism and one of the first Israelis to be ordained a Reform rabbi – will be in Toronto this weekend as part of an outreach effort by the Reform movement to Israelis living here.

On April 12, he will speak at an "Israel-style" Friday night service co-sponsored by Neshamah Congregation of York Region, ARZA Canada, Kachol-Lavan and the Schwartz-Reisman Centre. The service will take place at the centre at 6:45 p.m.

Rabbi Meir Azari

The following day, Rabbi Azari will speak at Shabbat morning services at Temple Sinai, then that night at the conclusion of the play The Whipping Man, a Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company production at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Rabbi Azari is the executive director of the Daniel Centers for Progressive Judaism, a Tel Aviv-based entity that encompasses three congregations and some two dozen schools. He has been with the organization since 1991, when it began as a synagogue, Beit Daniel. He is also director of Mishkenot Ruth Daniel, a guest house and education and community centre in Jaffa under the same umbrella.

During his visit here, he plans to let the community know that Reform Judaism is growing in Israel despite challenges such as restrictions on rabbis officiating at weddings and funerals, and repeated arrests of women who wear tallitot while praying at the Kotel. In Tel Aviv alone, there are 210 bnei mitzvah a year in the Reform community, he said in an interview from New York, where he is finishing a two-month sabbatical.

As well, he said, he is trying to help congregations like Neshamah reach out to Israelis who live here.

The effort is an extension of what he is doing in New York – a pilot outreach program at the Stephen Wise Free Synagogue in Manhattan intended in part to promote bridges between local Israeli families and the American Jewish community.

About one million Israelis live outside of Israel, and most don't understand the North American concept of a synagogue-based community, the rabbi said.

"You don't need congregations in Israel, because you know that Passover is Passover," he said. By living in Israel, "you live the memorial day and independence day."

Rabbi Azari said he is trying to give Israelis here a "channel" into synagogues. He believes this can be accomplished in part by bringing more Hebrew into the synagogue – for example, in adult education programs – and by increasing awareness among congregational staff and lay leaders, as well as among Israelis.

"I think that in every major city across North America, we have to have a congregation that offers a Hebrew home for Israelis. It's not enough to have the film festival or Yom Ha'atzmaut."

Beit Daniel, he said, has "managed to tell the Israeli community that synagogue is a nice environment, not something to be afraid of."

Many Israelis see Judaism as black and white, he explained, and see themselves as secular because the alternative is "too black."

The State of Israel and the Jewish Agency, of which Rabbi Azari is a board member, have introduced changes recently in the way Israeli emigrants are viewed, he said, explaining that they are now seen in a much more positive light.

"This is a large community. You cannot ignore this community – our children, families, friends, relatives whose life brought them to North America [because] someone fell in love, or found a better job.

"Why not keep in touch, learn from them, help them maintain a Jewish life?"

The Hebrew language alone will not maintain Judaism through a second and third generation, he said.

The rabbi, who was born in 1959 into a Sephardi family in Haifa, came to Reform Judaism by chance. His parents sent him to a school run by the Reform movement in Israel, simply because they were looking for a good school, he said.

His current sabbatical will be over this month, but he plans to continue his work in New York over the next three years.

From Auschwitz to Birkenau

Dan Kanter, left, musical director and guitar player for Justin Bieber, made an emotional visit to Auschwitz-Birkenau during Bieber's current 2013 European Believe Tour stop in Poland on March 25. The trip was organized by the March of the Living, an international educational institution dedicated to teaching the lessons of the Holocaust and to combating prejudice, intolerance and hate.

Recreating an 18th-century Polish synagogue

Evelyn Tauben

Last summer I travelled for the first time to Poland, where my grandparents were born, to help recreate murals from an 18th-century wooden synagogue in the town of Gwozdziec, now in Ukraine.

This synagogue replication is one part of a multi-phase decades-long exploration into Polish wooden synagogues by the Massachusetts-based organization, Handshouse Studio.

The newly built roof structure and painted domed ceiling of the Gwozdziec synagogue were recently unveiled in the Museum of the History of Polish Jews. Located on the site of the former Warsaw Ghetto and in the prewar Jewish neighbourhood of Warsaw, the museum opened a new building this month on April 19 to mark the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

For years, I followed Handshouse's project with great interest. With the announcement that hands-on workshops would be offered in Poland, I eagerly applied, seeing a chance to play a small role in the museum effort and to finally travel to Poland with a creative purpose.

The trip became an expression of a deep and complicated desire to connect with my Polish roots. I shaped an experience that was about being generative and collaborative – a curator curating my own experience. But life rarely conspires to be packaged so neatly and I was challenged in unforeseen ways.

In July, I joined a group of artists who were primarily from the United States, along with a handful of young Poles, for one of 12 Handshouse workshops hosted over two summers. Each two-week stint was based out of a different historic synagogue.

We worked in the southeastern town of Szczebrzeszyn, replicating the vibrant south dome murals of the Gwozdziec synagogue ceiling. The ceiling features two mythological creatures wrestling – a griffin and a dragon – surrounded by a network of vines and stylized flowers. A lower band includes an enigmatic combination of a leopard, turkey and deer. With awe, I observed the lead team, which has spent years dedicated to this project. Only one member has Jewish heritage. Among them, I felt both bolstered and weighed down by my background. Their passion was for making historical objects anew, practising their motto of learning through doing, but my desire was to enter into history and to appreciate more vividly a past that is personal.

Szczebrzeszyn is 113 miles from Lutsk, where my grandfather was from. As a teenager, instead of fulfilling his dream of attending art school, he was fleeing to the Soviet Union with his father and uncle. After the war, he opened an engraving shop in Los Angeles and supported his family by the work of his fine hands. I inherited his eye, if not his raw talent, and channelled the family business of colour, line and form into a career as a curator and producer. Instead of going to Lutsk, I imagined bringing my zaide with me.

As the Handshouse team doled out tasks, it was suggested that I help with the Hebrew text. But I desperately wanted to paint a flower. My Hebrew name is Vered or "rose," after my zaide's sister, Blumeh – "flower" in Yiddish. When the men in the family fled, Blumeh followed but was sent back to her mother and little brother to wait out the war. Instead the war came for them. Blumeh was 15. Now she exists only through threadbare memories and through me. Among the blossoms on the ceiling would be my quiet tribute – a blumeh for Blumeh.

A peculiar flower was assigned to me – a bulbous green pod with curled tips, resting on wide red petals. Through practise on test boards, I became connected with its curving shape, refining the technique of layering colours and blending them using rabbit-skin glue. When the time came to work on the actual panels, my hands trembled and I recalled my initial poetic notion of invoking my zaide's assured artistry to guide me. But in actuality, it was not easy painting with ghosts at my back.

The Handshouse synagogue replication, helmed by Rick and Laura Brown, is fuelled by curiosity and conviction resembling faith. Ritual abounded in this shul-turned-studio – not the recitation of Shema or standing for the Amidah but gathering daily for opening words of inspiration and spending hours carefully, rhythmically tracing out shapes, laying down background colours, mixing powder pigments into paint, and mimicking the markings of Isaac and Israel – the original mural painters.

Found a new understanding of my grandfather

Talmudic debates were replaced by a sort of "colourscape chevrutah," as painting leaders argued over the quality of a brushstroke or the saturation of the overall palette while huddled around archival black-and-white photos and the few remaining pre-1914 colour sketches. These artists share much in common with the devout: patience, dedication, fidelity to tradition, and commitment to legacy. While they were devoted to the solemnity of the process, I was yearning for a deeper connection to a place that I wanted to claim as my own.

With all energies devoted to figuratively looking up at the decorated ceiling, we often forgot to "look down" to the space that cannot be recreated – where the congregation gathered, where their voices lifted to meet the fanciful forms gracing that ceiling. I wanted to be with those people, to grasp why they built this elaborate house of worship, not just how. However, solely meditating on the massive devastation brought upon the Jews, or on the fact that no wooden synagogues still stand in Poland, obscures the reality that new synagogues are regularly built around the world and new Jewish communities continue to rise up, even in Poland.

The project's name is "Making History." I wondered what that meant. In remaking a historical object, what is drawn out of the recesses of the past? What is left behind? Expertise in painting a flower that once adorned a shul does not translate into appreciating what a shul actually is. As a descendant of makers of the everyday stuff of life, from my seamstress great-grandmother and my mother, a designer, I tried to enter fully into the process of making, but a feeling of incompleteness tugged at me. One day, a well-known teaching from Pirkei Avot came to mind, providing new perspective: "It is not your responsibility to complete the task, but neither are you free to desist from it."

The Browns enthusiastically began the task, launching a huge team effort and insisting on hosting educational workshops across Poland. (The less complicated, more reliable route would have been to carry out the project with the core group in their Massachusetts studios.) But it is not up to them to take on all the complex pieces that are hard-wired into this narrative. And it is not up to me. Neither am I free to desist from the challenging, vital task of bringing people into meaningful engagement with history and Jewish creative expression.

Producing Jewish arts events in recent years, I understood this in a broad sense, often encountering a self-conscious attitude that our culture could not be of interest to others. But now I feel it more acutely after immersion in a project of great significance to modern Jewry that was not spearheaded by Jews. Given the reservoirs of hurt still gathered around all things Jewish and Polish, it is not surprising that it took two sculptors from the East Coast of the United States to highlight what an artistic treasure had been built by Jewish communities in Poland before the war. Yet there was an essential quality – a Yiddishe neshama – missing from the process, which I felt acutely.

Between the push-pull of doing and discovering, at any given moment with the Handshouse team, I felt a mixture of pride and frustration, admiration and isolation. Perhaps what I was looking for – a textured experience of a Jewish past and present in the place where my entire family came from – could not be found in this art project.

But I did find Blumeh. After carrying her name with me since birth, I finally spent time with her while painting a funny little flower. And I found a new understanding of my grandfather – of his loss, his resilience, his courage and of his pressing impulse to create art. Clearly, there is no perfect "return to Poland" itinerary. But among our group there was an imperfect striving to tell and know one another's stories. In doing so, we were making history.

Evelyn Tauben is an independent curator, producer and writer with a focus on new Jewish culture. A version of this article appeared in the Jewish Daily Forward on Oct. 5, 2012.

Remembering Israel's fallen – Yom Hazikaron

At 11 o'clock on the morning of Monday, April 15, Israel will come to a standstill. Sirens will wail and Israelis – along with Jews around the world – will pause to remember the thousands of soldiers and civilians who paid the ultimate sacrifice for their country. Today, a look at Yom Hazikaron, remembrance day for Israel's fallen.

Start by looking at their faces. Israel's Ministry of Defence has created a moving site, and even if you can't read Hebrew, it is heartbreaking to flip through the Yizkor pages and pause to glance at photographs of the young men and women who gave their lives for their country. If you do understand Hebrew, read a few biographies to learn about the lives cut short. [http://bit.ly/zikaron1]

By 2012, 22,993 soldiers and other security personnel had fallen. Since the second intifadah, many have extended Yom Hazikaron to remember security guards who gave their lives guarding public buildings, restaurants and cafes. [http://bit.ly/zikaron2] The Orthodox Union site traces the number of casualties and summarizes the major battles from pre-State times. [http://bit.ly/zikaron3]

Yom Hazikaron also honours the memory of civilians whose lives have been tragically cut short. It is almost impossible to understand the grief of a small country that has given up so many of its young. That's why a memoir about the loss of one soldier has such an impact. Esther Wachsman's son, Nachshon, was held ransom by Hamas in October 1994. The IDF launched a military rescue that failed, and Nachshon and the commander of the rescue mission were both killed. [http://bit.ly/zikaron9]

"The entire nation mourned with us," Esther Wachsman writes. "Thousands came to comfort us, though no one can comfort a bereaved parent. Bus and taxi drivers who brought people from all over the country who wished to express their condolences left their vehicles and joined their passengers in our home. That unity, solidarity, caring, compassion and love with which we were showered gave us strength and filled our hearts with love for our people. After the shivah, we all returned to our routines... for that is what the Jewish People have always done – rebuilt after destruction, began new lives from the ashes and blood of the old."

Together we can survive

I recently had a chance to watch on YouTube a little excerpt of the 12th Siyum Hashas that was held on Aug. 1, 2012, at the MetLife Stadium in New Jersey in front of close to 100,000 people!

The Siyum Hashas is a completion of the whole cycle of Talmud in seven years and five months, learning one page per day.

The novel idea of learning a daf of Talmud a day was initiated by Rabbi Meir Shapiro on Aug. 16, 1923, at the first Agudath Israel convention, which took place in Vilna.

Watching a little part of the siyum gave me goose bumps. There was a festive atmosphere. People from different streams of Judaism were singing and dancing, almost 100,000 people praying the afternoon and evening service together left me awed, and the speeches made by the speakers I heard were exquisite. There was a feeling of unison in the air!

One of the speakers was a former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, who is a Holocaust child survivor. He reminded the crowd that the siyum is dedicated in memory of people who perished during the Holocaust. He spoke from his heart, and every word was a gem. One part of the speech touched me to the core of my heart. Rabbi Lau said that every day, in the morning prayer, we recite the song of the day, is a chapter of psalms related to that day. The siyum took place on Wednesday, and the first verse of the Wednesday song reads "Kel nakamot HaShem, Kel nekamot hofia," "God of vengeance HaShem, God of vengeance had appeared." Rabbi Lau said that the greatest vengeance is to have close to 100,000 Jews gathering to complete the shas!

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

His words reminded me of a similar message he gave when we hosted him in Vancouver, where he said that by being proud Jews and keeping our tradition alive, we show all our enemies that no one will ever be able to annihilate the Jewish People.

My wife and I recently had the merit to go to a shivah house visit for Ben Axelrod z'l. Ben and his wife, Rita, were Holocaust survivors who rebuilt their lives in Canada. On any occasion when I met them, they were a source of inspiration. They did not have to say a word – just being next to them rejuvenated me.

During our visit, Rita shared with us stories about her dear Ben, how much he meant to her, how difficult it was to start their lives in a new country and how they were successful in starting all over again.

As we have just commemorated Yom Hashoah, mourning the loss of people who perished during the Holocaust, and as we approach Yom Hazikaron, remembering the Israeli soldiers and the people who died during terrorist attacks, let us remember that, as a nation, we are invincible. As the Passover Haggadah says, "In every generation, there are those who rise against us to destroy us, but God rescues us from them."

May God give all of us the strength and conviction to continue surviving.

Separating affordability and sustainability

Day school is the gold standard of Jewish education. Across multiple metrics, day school graduates have broader and deeper Jewish knowledge bases and stronger Jewish identities. Day school graduates disproportionately constitute young Jewish leaders, shaping communities today and the face of Judaism into the future.

Notwithstanding their success, I am concerned for the future of day schools.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Often conflated, there are two interconnected crises: sustainability and affordability.

Let's begin with sustainability.

Day school financial sustainability necessitates a long-term plan to ensure that revenue – from all streams – covers costs.

Across North America, there are approximately 300 day schools ranging from Reform to Centrist Orthodox (including Orthodox schools farther to the right doubles the number). These schools have a combined annual budget of approximately $1.5 billion. On average – and there is a significant range – 80 per cent of this budget is covered by tuition.

A long-term sustainability plan must develop new revenue streams while controlling costs. Developing revenue streams includes creating endowments, increasing annual fundraising and increasing revenue from ancillary services such as rentals.

To examine one area, only half of Jewish day schools have endowments, with a combined total of slightly over $250 million. In comparison, the top 10 American independent schools each has more than $200 million in its endowment. Through matching grants and concentrated fundraising, in recent years the Federations of Los Angeles and Metrowest have significantly increased day school endowments, lowering the schools' annual financial burden.

Initiatives to decrease costs include "right sizing" to operate at capacity, collective purchasing, combining back-office operations and introducing blended learning through technology. While some efficiencies can be found, 70 per cent of the average school budget is allocated to human resources. But without significantly reducing the school's core – the teaching staff – little can be achieved.

While sustainability is about the long-term viability of the school, affordability is about the individual parent's perception of cost and value. A school can be affordable at $500 tuition but not sustainable. Conversely, it can be sustainable at $40,000 tuition but unaffordable.

On a relative basis, day school is more expensive than it was five years ago, with tuition rising an average of three to six per cent per year for the last decade – an increase far in excess of wages. Compounded by the economic downturn, in the last eight years, day school subsidy requests have doubled across North America.

Schools and communities are combating the issue of affordability in a variety of ways: capping tuition at a percentage of gross annual income, developing subsidies for middle-income families, and building community funds for Jewish education to shift the burden away from parents.

Notwithstanding these multiple efforts, providing children with a day school education will always come at an opportunity cost. Parallel to financial interventions, schools must work to increase the perceived value of their services. Studies show that day school enrolment is more strongly correlated to parents' perceived value than to tuition, making the parents' perception of the school, community, and education key determinants in the affordability puzzle.

There is no silver bullet. The financial cost of educating children in day schools is high. The communal and social cost of not sustaining the schools, however, is even higher.

Legal information service for abused women

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Act to End Violence Against Women has recently opened a free legal information service for Jewish women over age 18 and living in the GTA who have experienced abuse.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of Act to End Violence Against Women, said the service helps women navigate the legal system in Ontario by providing legal support workers, community education, pro bono summary advice, referrals to lawyers and community resources.

The legal support workers have been trained to understand family law in Ontario, she said. "They do not offer legal advice, however, and the intent is not to replace a lawyer or advice from a lawyer.

"The workers help women understand the family law process, explore their rights and responsibilities and identify their legal issues, and provide moral and emotional support."

Krowitz said that women experience many barriers when trying to access the legal system. "They need to find a lawyer who is sensitive to abuse and understands its many nuances, and [they need] to have the funds to pay a lawyer.

"Many abused women are immobilized, and often stay in the relationship because they are frightened and are afraid to explore their options. That's where our service comes in."

The stories of abused women are always complex, she said. "Our workers – some speak Hebrew and Russian – help a woman unpack her story and identify her priorities. Children are often used as pawns in the legal game, and I can't even begin to imagine all the stories out there.

"[The workers] will also accompany a woman to court or to the lawyer, and they develop a list of resources available to her. There is nothing in the Jewish community that provides a holistic information service."

A number of lawyers have agreed to give pro bono summary advice, and have spoken to the workers about such issues as custody, access and stress, she said.

Krowitz said that when setting up the clinic, they sent out a questionnaire to a number of family lawyers in the Greater Toronto Area to determine whether they were willing to participate in the clinic, and to screen them for their knowledge of domestic violence.

The service has a reciprocal agreement with The Barbra Schlifer Clinic, which offers legal help, counselling and language interpretation to women who have experienced violence. "They also started off as a volunteer service."

Women's shelters are pleased that the service has started up, Krowitz said, because it is challenging to get information out to the women who need it.

The "complex and detailed" project took about a year and a half to get off the ground, she said.

The service, by appointment only, is housed in the Thornhill offices of Act to End Violence Against Women. It is funded with grants from sources including the Carole & Howard Tanenbaum Charitable Family Foundation and the Law Foundation of Ontario. Meat for the 'kosher carnivore'

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

June Hersh's mantra is: "Eat well – do good." She is the author of Recipes Remembered, a Celebration of Survival, written to benefit the Museum of Jewish Heritage in New York.

Her second cookbook, The Kosher Carnivore (St. Martin's Press), contains 120 all-new, innovative recipes for cooks of all levels and is a primer for anyone wanting to learn more about the extensive choices of meat and poultry available at their supermarket or butcher. Hersh explains how to prepare every kosher cut of meat and includes helpful tips throughout the book, including advice on which cuts are interchangeable in recipes.

You'll find creative recipes for meat and poultry dishes that can be served as appetizers, salads and main dishes. She also includes a selection of dairy-free soups, side dishes, marinades and sauces to pair with the main course.

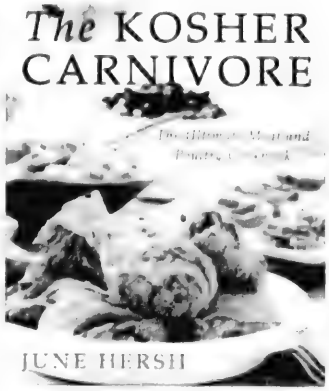
Hersh writes about various cooking methods, including braising, pot roasting, stewing, broiling and grilling. She provides an overview on marinades, rubs, glazes, spices and herbs. Here are some of her helpful tips for the kosher carnivore:

• When marinating poultry, if the skin is not an important element in the dish, remove it, as it presents a barrier to the marinade.

• Avoid metal containers. They will react with the acid and could impart a tinny taste to your finished dish. Resealable plastic bags are a better option as you can massage the liquid into the meat and easily turn the meat while taking up little space in your fridge. And cleanup is a snap.

• Once a marinade has been exposed to raw meat, it needs to be treated very carefully. If you thoroughly boil it, you can use it to baste the meat. However, instead of tempting fate, reserve a little marinade at the start and use that as a basting sauce at the end.

The Kosher Carnivore is an excellent culinary resource for anyone wanting to know more about meat and poultry and would make a wonderful gift for a new bride. The wontons and stir-fry are ideal for weekend dinner guests and the pasta is perfect for a weekday meal. Enjoy!



CRISPY ORANGE BEEF AND BROCCOLI

This is not your average stir-fry; this one is ready for a Saturday night debut. It has the right balance between spicy and sweet, with both notes partnering perfectly with the beef and broccoli. Successful stir-frying is all about preparation: if you have all your ingredients ready to roll, you will have no problem with this fast cooking method. Serves 4 (2 if you are super-hungry). Start to finish: under 45 minutes.

1 lb. beef, cut against the grain into strips 1 in. wide and 2 to 3 inches long
1 large dried poblano chili
Sauce:
2 tbsp. Madeira or dry sherry
2 tbsp. hoisin sauce
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. chili-garlic sauce
2 tbsp. low-sodium soy sauce zest and juice from 1 small orange (about 1 tbsp. grated zest, 1/4 cup juice)
1 tbsp. brown sugar
Stir-fry:
1 small head broccoli, florets only, blanched
3 tbsp. cornstarch
1/4 cup peanut or vegetable oil
1 large garlic clove, minced (about 1-1/2 tsp.)
1 tbsp. grated fresh ginger
1 scallion, white and green parts, sliced, for garnish cooked rice for serving

Spread the beef out on a plate lined with a paper towel and refrigerate uncovered for at least 30 minutes or up to 1 hour. Drying the meat will give it a crisper finish when it's fried.

To reconstitute the poblano, cover it in a small bowl with very hot water. When soft, remove the stem and seeds and slice the pepper into thin strips; set aside.

To prepare the sauce: whisk together the Madeira, hoisin, honey, chili-garlic sauce, soy sauce, orange juice, orange zest and brown sugar. Set aside.

Bring a large pot of salted water to a boil and blanch the broccoli for 3 to 4 minutes. Drain and place in a bowl filled with ice water to stop the cooking. Set aside.

To stir-fry: Heat half the oil in a large skillet or wok. Remove the meat from the fridge and toss with the cornstarch in a resealable plastic bag. Shake off excess cornstarch and carefully drop the meat into the oil. Cook over medium-high heat until crispy and browned, 5 to 7 minutes. You might need to do this in two batches so as not to overcrowd the pan. Transfer the finished meat to a plate and set aside.

In the same pan, add the remaining oil, only if the pan is dry, and stir-fry the broccoli, garlic and ginger over medium-high heat for 2 minutes. Add the reserved sauce, poblano chili and beef. Cook for several minutes until the sauce has thickened and the meat is glossy and coated with sauce.

Garnish with the sliced scallions and serve spooned over rice.

Behind the counter: Hanger steak, cut into strips (have your butcher remove the sinewy vein) is very flavourful and tender in this dish. You don't want to use tougher cuts that require braising, as this is a quick stir-fry. Make sure your butcher cuts the beef from a portion meant for stir-fry, not pepper steak. Don't even think about using rib meat for this preparation – it would be like wearing a ball gown to a ball game. Alternate cuts: thin cut minute steak or thin cuts from the top blade, the silver tip or the neck portion at the top of the chuck.

Group fights Israel apathy at Touro College in NY

Elianna Mintz
Israel Campus Beat

What would you do if your campus had no anti-Israel activity? What if it had little or no pro-Israel activity either? Would that be enough of a reason to do nothing regarding Israel during your college years?

That's the question facing students at Touro College for Women in New York City. The Orthodox women who comprise the student body have strong religious ties to Israel but are generally apathetic – they support Israel but do little to educate themselves about it.

"Because we operate in a religious school, we often have to fight more against apathy and lethargy from the students rather than the outright antagonism that is likely present in more diverse colleges," said Touro senior Adina Schechtman, who is head of the Lander College for Women Israel Advocacy Project (LCWIAP).

Students can discuss state in both religious and secular terms

To fight this apathy, a small group of Touro students joined together to change the lacklustre attitude toward Israel, and formed the advocacy project, an offshoot of the Jewish Community Relations Council (JCRC) of New York.

The Israel advocacy project runs regular programs, hosts speakers and puts out a bimonthly newsletter aimed at keeping faculty and students abreast of relevant current events and advocacy opportunities.

"Many Touro students took a year off to study in Israel (prior to starting their studies at the school), but aren't particularly informed about the state or passionate about the country or its often tenuous political environment," Schechtman said.

Speakers brought to Touro by the advocacy project include representatives of Faces of Israel, a program that explores different aspects of Israel; and Shlomi Kaufman, Israel's deputy consul general in New York. Events have included a screening of the movie Israel Inside and a gala party for the college to celebrate Yom Ha'azmaut.

"Our programs are generally aimed at creating a positive perception and good associations with the country that is so often associated with war and terror," Schechtman said.

"Our primary activities are directed toward educating the students about Israel and the variety of opinions and discussions (both historical and current) revolving around the state," said Raphaela Abramson, former LCWIAP president and current member.

In addition to the events it organizes on the Touro campus, the advocacy project is interested in expanding and reaching out to Israel clubs on other local campuses to offer assistance.

"The amount of antisemitism disguised as criticism of the state on most college campuses, not to mention the basic lack of awareness regarding the state, demands Israel advocacy, regardless of which college or ethnicity one belongs to," Abramson, a senior, told Israel Campus Beat.

"Touro girls can present a viewpoint not often heard on secular campuses," she said. "They can discuss the state in both religious and secular terms, and often have first-hand knowledge of the state."

Because more than 75 per cent of Touro's student body have been to Israel, including many who spent an academic year studying there, Abramson said they can speak about their personal Israel experiences, enhancing the conversations on other campuses.

"Many students know Jewish students and can discuss Israel within a secular context, but actually discussing the state with a religious Jew and hearing her perspective, both in religious and secular contexts, is a rare opportunity," Abramson concluded.

Israel Campus Beat is a student-written online publication that covers campus Israel trends and events.

DID SPINOZA BETRAY THE JEWS?

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 17, 7:30 PM

with Dr. Ariela Di Castro-Bzhezinsky, the Grafstein Post-Doctoral Fellow, University of Toronto

No Charge

Born and raised in Rome, Italy, Dr. Di Castro-Bzhezinsky specializes in modern Jewish philosophy. Her lecture will profile an extremely controversial subject: Baruch (Baruch) Spinoza and his devastating critique of Judaism as a way of life and thought. So radical were his views that the Jewish community of Amsterdam excommunicated him. Yet, so profound was his influence in the shaping of modern Jewish thought that Israel's first Prime Minister, David Ben-Gurion, wanted to accord Spinoza the honour of being interred in the land of Israel. Dr. Di Castro-Bzhezinsky will also address two contemporary questions: Why do we keep Jewish law? What is the boundary between freedom of speech and incitement to anti-Semitism?

God's emissary of salvation

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin
Special to The CJN

Erev Pesach, the day before Passover. Arguably, the rabbi's busiest day of the year. Yet, it was on that very Sunday before Pesach that I took a quick trip into New York to make a shivah call to my rebbe, Rabbi Jacob J. Schacter, who had just lost his father, Rabbi Herschel Schacter. The younger Rabbi Schacter has done so much in mentoring me in my developing years as a pulpit rabbi, and he was kind enough to be the scholar-in-residence for my installation Shabbat this year here in Toronto, and I felt it was the least I could do.

I had travelled to console my teacher, not knowing very much about his father. But in the course of the trip, I learned that the father was a unique rabbinic hero whose impact reverberates far and wide. My colleague, Rabbi Benjamin Samuels of Newton, Mass., shared some of Reb Herschel's legacy.

Rabbi Herschel Schacter was one of the first disciples of Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, famed dean of Yeshiva University. He went on to become a pulpit rabbi in the Bronx for over 50 years. What he's most famously known for, however, is that he was the first U.S. army chaplain to liberate the Buchenwald concentration camp in 1945.

As the New York Times recently reported, his was the voice that the inmates first heard, as he went from barrack to barrack in the hellhole, shouting, "Shalom aleichem, Yidden, ihr zint frei!" – "Jews, you are free!" He stayed on longer and aided with the resettlement of displaced persons.

Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, the former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel and current chief rabbi of Tel Aviv, tells of Rabbi Schacter's role in liberating him at Buchenwald. In his inspiring memoir, Out of the Depths, Rabbi Lau writes: "I remember the looks of horror on the faces of the American soldiers when they came in and stared around them. I was afraid when I saw them. I crept behind a pile of dead bodies and hid there, watching them warily... Rabbi Herschel Schacter was the Jewish chaplain of the division. I saw him get out of a jeep and stand there, staring at the corpses. He has often told this story, how he thought he saw a pair of living eyes looking out from among the dead. It made his hair stand on end, but slowly and cautiously he made his way around the pile, and then, he clearly remembers coming face-to-face with me, an eight-year-old boy, wide-eyed with terror.

"In heavily-accented American Yiddish, he asked me, 'How old are you, mein kind?' There were tears in his eyes. 'What difference does it make?' I answered, warily. 'I'm older than you, anyway.'

"He smiled through his tears and said, 'Why do you think you're older than me?' And I answered, 'Because you cry and laugh like a child. I haven't laughed in a long time, and I don't even cry anymore. So which one of us is older?'"

Rabbi Schacter had previously led a Pesach Sheini seder at Buchenwald on April 27, 1945. In the Torah, Pesach Sheini is the holiday of second chances, the Pesach sacrificial observance for anyone who, for reasons beyond their control, could not participate in that year's Passover. This was probably the first Pesach Sheini seder since the time of the Temple, and this seder of second chances was now being offered to the new survivors.

Shiku Smilovic, in his autobiographical memoir, Buchenwald 56466, tells about that day: "All Jews were invited by Rabbi Schacter to attend services and to eat matzah, since it was Pesach Sheini that day. Rabbi Schacter brought matzahs and distributed them to everyone. Rabbi Schacter started to deliver his sermon, when suddenly he was interrupted by a fellow prisoner. When he heard the rabbi say, 'We know what you have gone through,' the man screamed and said, 'No one, but no one, can dare say that he knows what we went through, unless he or she was there! Only they can say, "I know what you went through!"' He continued at the top of his voice with quotes from the Torah and other scriptures. He was no plain, ordinary everyday Jew. He spoke with authority.

"'Why did God forget about his children? And we were devastated, just because we are Jews?' he continued. 'Before we make a blessing and eat this matzah, we want a din Torah with the Ribono Shel Olam [to hold court with the Almighty]: Why? Why the little children? They didn't have a chance to sin yet! Why so many thousands of true dedicated talmidei chachomim [learned men], that were sitting and learning yomam v'laila, day and night? You can take your matzahs back to America. I don't want them. As far as I am concerned, the rest of you, you are free! You can do what your heart desires!'

"Rabbi Schacter did not interrupt the man and he let him finish. He moved his fists towards his heart and said, 'Chotosi uvisi pushati lefonecha: Please, may I have your forgiveness?' The man raced up to the rabbi and embraced him for a while. The rest of us just stood there in silence, and our tears did the talking. After that scene, we all decided to have some matzah anyway. We made the blessing of achilat matzah in unison. I am sure that this blessing was heard in heaven, and all the angels answered, 'Amen.'"

Here's one more story that I discovered at the shivah. The Thursday before Passover, U.S. President Barack Obama was in Israel visiting Yad Vashem, where he met with the president of Israel, the prime minister and Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau.

After the president was presented with a memento of his visit, Rabbi Lau turned to him and told of how he had recently been in Seattle, where a non-Jewish World War II veteran came over to him with tears in his eyes and said, "I was part of the team that liberated you from Buchenwald. I need to ask your forgiveness, because seeing all the dead bodies, we discovered we had come too late."

Rabbi Lau turned to the president and said, "We appreciate so much how you've promised to come to our aid. All we ask is that you not be too late."

While recounting the story of his liberation, Rabbi Lau mentioned to the president how grateful he was to the United States, in that he had been liberated by the American army chaplain Rabbi Herschel Schacter. Unbeknownst to the people in that room, Rabbi Schacter had passed away the night before. The liberator's soul had just then been liberated.

In the Haggadah we read, "It is this [covenant] which has had staying power for our ancestors and for us. For it is not just one nation that rose up against us, but rather in every generation they rise up against us. And God always saves us from their clutches."

This has given strength and hope to our people in the face of suffering. No matter how dark the day may be, eventually "God saves us from their clutches." Despite the carnage and death, He will not allow our people to be utterly extinguished, and will send us his holy proxies, like Rabbi Herschel Schacter, to liberate us.

May his memory be a blessing

Turkey-Israel breakthrough goes beyond Obama

Most media reports that dealt with Israel's apology to Turkey late last month for "operational errors" in the deaths of nine Turkish citizens during the 2010 Mavi Mamara incident described it as something that was brokered by U.S. President Barack Obama on the final day of his visit to Israel.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While it's true that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu spoke with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Erdogan after Obama, who initiated the call, handed Netanyahu the phone, the real story of what lead to the Israel-Turkey breakthrough goes far beyond the U.S. presidency.

Almost two years ago, Reuters reported that Israel made overtures to Turkey and initiated low-level meetings to find a way to re-establish ties. Reuters noted that Zvi Hauser, Netanyahu's cabinet secretary, was exploring ways of breaking the impasse in the hope that a "redeeming formula" for reconciliation could be found.

Avigdor Lieberman, then Israel's foreign minister, was opposed to any apology, claiming that Israel, after all, had acted in justified self-defence after its commandos had been brutally assaulted. Lieberman also stated: "It is clear that [Erdogan] is looking not for accommodation, nor peace, nor normalization, but wants to humiliate the State of Israel, sap its international standing and harm our status in the region."

Indeed, Erdogan's hostility to Israel is deeply rooted and, it appears, deeply personal – as his recent characterization of Zionism as a crime against humanity would indicate. (Only after widespread international condemnation of his outrageous remark did Erdogan backtrack, claiming he only meant to criticize Israel's actions against the Palestinians, but he did so in such a way as to compound the original insult with further lies, as this paper's editor appropriately remarked in his March 28 column.)

In any event, it was primarily Erdogan himself who rejected Israel's overtures, insisting that Israel not only apologize but end its naval blockade of Gaza.

At the beginning of August 2011, writing for the Gatestone Institute, Efraim Cohen discussed rumours of a deal and posited the following scenario: "The broad outlines of the deal suggest that Israel would offer a limited apology for 'operational errors,' and would pay compensation to the families of those who died. In return, Turkey would recognize the legality of Israel's naval blockade of Gaza and would agree not to seek legal action against Israeli soldiers who were involved." This is precisely the deal that was reportedly struck last month, the culmination of a string of negotiations that took some time, despite the deal's contours being known long ago (and confirmed in the Turkish paper Radikal on Feb. 20).

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Erdogan

Significantly, Erdogan had to drop his demand that Israel end its naval blockade. (The UN-commissioned Palmer Report, released in September 2011, criticized operational mistakes made by Israel aboard the Mavi Marmara while at the same time affirming the legality of the blockade.) Currently, Erdogan is bragging about the apology he "extracted" from Israel and has indicated that there will be no "full" restoration of ties until Israel ends the blockade. If Turkey actually insists on changing the terms of the agreement, Erdogan will have to face Obama, not Netanyahu.

By carefully and persistently navigating this agreement and providing Obama an opportunity to take credit for the diplomatic breakthrough – a rare achievement for Obama on the Middle East file – Netanyahu showed statesmanship. Erdogan has shown crassness and bluster.

Still, as many analysts have pointed out, it's in the interests of Turkey as well as Israel to have better relations while the broader region descends into uncertainty and (in the case of Syria) dangerous chaos.

Even during the period of frozen diplomatic relations following the Mavi Mamara imbroglio, as the March 30 Economist explained, Israel and Turkey managed to maintain military ties, in addition to trade worth $3 billion per year. With Israel's current development of huge gas fields in the Mediterranean, a private Turkish energy company, with $1 billion of investments in Israel, wants Israel to allow a gas pipeline to be built to Turkey. This is just one important sign that, despite Erdogan, Israeli-Turkish possibilities are promising.

WINNIPEG — After several years of showcasing Israeli musicians and singers, Winnipeg's Jewish National Fund Negev Gala has selected a North American entertainer for the 2013 event.

Jason Alexander has been on stage, in movies, on TV and behind the scenes as a writer, producer and director, but most people know him as George Costanza on the long-running hit sitcom Seinfeld.

"Jason has tremendous name recognition. With his presence, we hope to make more people aware of and interested in the amazing work the JNF is doing in Israel," said Karla Berbayer, president of JNF's Manitoba/Saskatchewan region.

"Tickets started flying out the door as soon as we announced he was coming."

Berbrayer said Alexander is an apt choice for this year's event, scheduled for June 4, because of his role as spokesperson for One Voice, a grassroots group of Israelis and Palestinians who favour a two-state solution for peace.

One Voice is pursuing the same goals as the Arab-Jewish Dialogue (AJD), a local group that's this year's Negev honoree.

JNF usually honours individuals, but previous honorees have included the Asper Foundation and Winnipeg Holocaust survivors.

"The Arab-Jewish Dialogue's commitment to promote trust through education benefits us all," Berbrayer said, adding that "we applaud the AJD's commitment to bringing people of diverse backgrounds together to discuss current issues."

AJD co-founder Ab Freig said it's "a great honour to be recognized by the JNF for the work that we are doing... We are delighted."

The AJD began as a friendship between Freig, an Egyptian-born Winnipeg businessman, and longtime Winnipeg Jewish community leader Harold Buchwald, who died in April 2008 at age 80.

The aim of the AJD, which was officially launched in 2010, is to foster better relations between Canadian Arabs and Jews.

"Our vision is of a Canada inspired by the relations between its Arabs and Jews," said Howard Morry, a past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and current AJD co-chair with Freig.

Morry said similar dialogues have taken place between Muslims and Jews, but the AJD is the first to bring together Jews and Arabs.

"We believe that the ultimate solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict is a sovereign, contiguous, democratic Palestinian state living side by side with a sovereign, secure, democratic Jewish state," the AJD said in a statement. "We believe that no religion has a monopoly on the truth, and we abhor any group using religion to justify the use of violence.

"We believe that while Canadian Arabs and Jews may disagree from time to time over events in the Middle East, they can and should work together to resolve those differences peacefully."

Jason Alexander

Freig said AJD members are working on projects in Israel that bring Arab and Jewish Israelis together.

"We are supporting, for example, a school in Israel that brings together Arab and Jewish children," he said. "We are looking to work with other organizations like that that foster understanding between Arabs and Jews both in Israel and here in Canada."

He said that AJD members are "are passionate about peace and conflict resolution. We believe that most conflicts can be resolved if people dialogue and understand the narratives of the other person."

Morry said there's been interest in the group from Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

The project to be funded by this year's gala will involve Arab-Jewish co-operation in Israel, but the specific project has yet to be announced.

Clergy disagrees with the mayor

He told of a congregant – a married father of three – whose family had cut him off because of his gambling. "He left his children penniless, and he himself was on the street on Passover, because he had no place to go."

The rabbi was one of more than half a dozen speakers including representatives of the Canadian Council of Imams, the Hindu Dharma Mission of Canada, the GTA Council of Christian Churches, the Anglican Diocese of Toronto, the Jain Society of Toronto, and the Guru Ram Das Ashram, who had signed the Interfaith Statement Opposing Casino Expansion in the Toronto Area.

Rev. Christopher White, who moderated the event, said the group objected to "the negative impact the proposed casino expansion will have on our fellow citizens and the life we all share."

He said he "would respectfully disagree" with Mayor Rob Ford, who earlier that day had said the majority of Torontonians were in favour of a casino.

The interfaith statement was an outgrowth of a symposium in January called Faith in the City, to address areas of common social concern. Rev. White called the anti-casino initiative an "unprecedented and historic show of unity."

Opposition to casino expansion was unanimous among the speakers, despite some differences in perspective.

In the Hindu tradition, for example, gambling is strictly forbidden, and will lead to physical, mental and spiritual suffering in this life and the next, said Pandit Suraj Persad of the Hindu Dharma Mission of Canada.

But Torah and Jewish tradition are not opposed to "casual" gambling at certain times during the year, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. However, he clarified, "regular and extended and ongoing" gambling is prohibited.

Bishop Philip Poole of the Anglican Diocese of Toronto noted that gambling "offers the illusion of getting something for nothing, [but] the house always wins.

"I understand that governments need to be creative in finding new sources of revenue, but casinos are not the way forward."

STATEMENT BY CLERGY

We, the undersigned faith leaders and representatives in the Greater Toronto Area, stand united in opposing the expansion of casinos proposed by the Ontario Lottery and Gaming Corporation and support the anti-casino campaign led by www.NoCasinoToronto.com.

We represent diverse faith communities with unique perspectives, principles, sacred texts, traditions and teachings that form the basis of our opposition to expanded gambling. We are unified in our position that gambling is contrary to the ethical norms of our traditions because it negatively impacts our faith communities and the wider public.

We are convinced that casinos contribute to family breakdown, depression, addiction, bankruptcies and crime, and thus are antithetical to our mission as faith traditions to strengthen individuals, families and communities.

Our faith traditions teach us that our governments should maintain order, preserve justice and promote the common good. We believe that our governments must take a stand to promote the values of education, hard work, social justice and the dignity of labour, and reject the illusion of easy money, for both individuals and public coffers.

Our governments should protect the most vulnerable in our society from casinos that exploit human weaknesses and addictions. We therefore call upon our governments to reject gambling expansion and reject this predatory industry as a solution to economic and fiscal problems.

We strongly urge our Municipal City Councils to vote against any new casinos in the Greater Toronto Area. We further urge our brothers and sisters in our faith communities to become informed about this issue and voice their opposition to expanded gambling to our elected officials.

כמה ימים לפני חג הפסח התקיימה מסיבת הסיום של "בית ספר למוסיקה, עונה 2". זוהי התכנית שהופכת את ישראל למקום טוב יותר ועליה אדבר בהמשך. באותה מסיבת סיום שרה הילדה שהובילה כל העונה וזכתה בצדק בפרס הגדול, אגם בוחבוט מכתה ד' בבאר שבע, את שירם של ביאליק ונחמה הנדל "הכניסיני תחת כנפך". ומה אומר לכם- באותן ארבע דקות לא היתה עין יבשה במדינת ישראל. וכדי שלא יהיה ספק בליבכם- הינה הקישור כדי שתראו ותבכו מהתרגשות בעצמכם.

http://www.mako.co.il/tv-music-school/season2-articles/Article-7577764ed78ec31006.htm

ילדים מוכשרים מאוד, מורים שהם אמנים מעולים, צניעות, פשטות, בחירת שירים מעולה שמביאה דור שלם להכיר את שירי ארץ ישראל מכל התקופות. אין כאן פלצנות, יוהרה, חנטריש, גסות רוח או רווחים קלים. המסר הוא שצריך לעבוד קשה מאוד ולהיות בנאדם. ושישאר בינינו.

מה יהיה

אשה יפה בחצאית עור צרה מנסה לעלות במדרגות אוטובוס ללא הצלחה. היא מחייכת במבוכה ופותחת מעט את הריצ'ראץ' שבגבה, אבל ללא הלצחה. היא מנסה שוב אך עדיין איננה מצליחה לעלות במדרגות. פתאום אוחז בה גבר גדול שעומד בתור ממש מאחוריה ושם אותה במעלה המדרגות בתוך האוטובוס. מסתובבת האשה ואומרת לו בכעס: איך אתה מעז לגעת בי ככה, אנחנו אפילו לא מכירים זה את זו!

עונה לה האיש במבוכה: ואני חשבתי שאחרי ששלוש פעמים פתחת לי את הריצ'ראץ' של מכנסי, יש בינינו יחסים די מתקדמים.....

Global antisemitism grew by 30 per cent in 2012

JTA

JERUSALEM — Global antisemitism increased by 30 per cent in 2012 over the previous year, an annual report found.

Following two years of decline, there was a "considerable escalation" in the number of violent acts and level of vandalism against Jews in 2012, according to the global antisemitism report for 2012 presented Sunday by the Kantor Center for the Study of Contemporary European Jewry at Tel Aviv University.

The report, which was presented on the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day, showed there were 686 violent acts and vandalism, up from 526 in 2011. They include 273 attacks on people, including 50 with a weapon, 166 direct threats on lives and the desecration of 190 synagogues, cemeteries and monuments.

France had the most attacks with 200, up from 114 in 2011. Next was the United States with 99; the United Kingdom, 84; Canada, 74; and Australia, 53.

An anti-Jewish poster in Hungary (Wikimedia)

The report said the increase was due in part to the terror attack on the Otzar Hatorah school in Toulouse in March, which killed a rabbi and three children and led to a series of copycat incidents against the Jewish community in France. Also contributing were Israel's Operation Pillar of Defence in Gaza, which led to a short-lived increase in antisemitic acts, and an escalation in the activities of the extreme right wing and the strengthening of parties with a clear antisemitic agenda, notably in Hungary and Greece, as well as in Ukraine.

During a news conference Sunday to release the report's results, Moshe Kantor, president of the European Jewish Congress, identified Hungary as experiencing the most worrying racist and antisemitic trends in Europe.

"There are extremely worrying signs emanating from Hungary at the moment, where barely a week passes without an attack on minorities or outrageous comments from far-right politicians," Kantor said. "Unfortunately, red lines keep being crossed, and there needs to be an extremely strong reaction, both from the Hungarian government and the European Union to push back against these phenomena."

Kantor called for "a policy of 'zero tolerance' for racism."

"We are reaching out to the leaders in Hungary and the EU and calling for the initiation of hearings in relevant committees because this situation cannot continue," he said.

French Jews win right to choose their own names

Rebecca Benhamou
The Times of Israel

PARIS — After decades of denying Jews the right to change their French last names to their original Jewish ones, the French Ministry of Justice recently revised its position.

Fearful of antisemitism, many French Jews decided to adopt French surnames in the late 1940s and '50s.

"Even though the French administration never forced them to adopt less foreign sounding names, they were highly encouraged to do so," says Céline Masson, a lecturer in psychoanalysis at Université Paris-Diderot and a co-founder of La Force du Nom (The Strength of the Name), a Paris-based organization that lobbies for the right to reclaim old names.

Nearly 70 years after World War II, many descendants of both Holocaust survivors and Jews from North Africa have decided to reconnect with their roots by taking back the names of their ancestors.

French law, however, stipulates that once changed, a last name is considered "immutable." It also prohibits citizens from reverting to a "foreign sounding name."

In 2010, the debate entered the national spotlight when Masson and co-founder Natalie Felzenszwalbe submitted their first name-change requests to the State Council, the relevant government agency.

"We're talking about a very small minority here," Masson told the Times of Israel. "So far, we've had about 30 cases or so. But in a country where 76,000 Jews were deported (during the Holocaust), it's bound to be a powerful debate."

In their applications, both advocates argued that allowing the reversion to previous names constitutes a "symbolic reparation" that France owes its Jewish citizens.

"Reparation has been achieved at every level in France: when Nazi collaborators Klaus Barbie, Paul Touvier and Maurice Papon were brought to justice in the 1980s and 1990s; when former president Jacques Chirac made his famous 1995 speech and became the first French politician to recognize France's responsibility in the July 1942 Vel d'Hiv Roundup; and of course financial reparations. What's missing is the right of name reversion," Masson said.

Even though she and Felzenszwalbe were initially told the law wouldn't be repealed, the French Ministry of Justice has revised its policy, adopting a case-by-case approach.

> Nearly 70 years after World War II, many descendants of both Holocaust survivors and Jews from North Africa have decided to reconnect with their roots

In an op-ed titled "Stranger to One's Name," published in the daily Libération newspaper Feb. 28, 41-year-old David Forest – now renamed Fuks – explained how he was finally allowed to revert to his Polish-born grandfather's name in October 2012, more than 60 years after the family changed it.

"When I was asked about the origins of my name, even people with the best intentions never failed to ask what my 'real name' was," he wrote. "In fact, I often heard my parents say that our current name wasn't a 'real one.'"

"The truth lay within the name we abandoned — the only one that truly said where our family came from and who we were."

In her 2012 book, Rendez-nous Nos Noms! Quand des Juifs Revendiquent Leur Identité Perdue (Give Back Our Names! When Jews Reclaim Their Lost Identities) Masson writes that the number of name changes within the French Jewish community peaked between 1945 and 1957 — a total of 2,000 requests.

Originally from Tunisia, Masson's family – the Hassans – changed its name when it immigrated to France in the '60s, like many other Sephardi families from Morocco and Algeria.

"My name has been changed, and it's not difficult to pronounce it," she wrote.

"It is cut off from its history and its original language; it has lost its flavour, its accent."

In her book, Masson also interviews Tunisian-born Magali Taillé – originally Taieb – whose family emigrated to France at the same time.

"Magali Taieb was a young Jewish girl raised in the values of Tunisian society of the 1950s. She stopped growing up in 1970. Magali Taillé was born in the same year and studied in Parisian universities. Between the two, there's a gap, a distance, a duality, an incompatibility. Until they were finally reconciled."

Backed by years of experience as a psychoanalyst and her personal history, Masson explains that changing one's name can represent a "trauma," especially for younger generations that now want to reconnect with their Jewish roots and family past.

In some cases, certain family members choose to revert to their old Jewish names, while others maintain the newer one.

"Sometimes family members don't agree on what their name should be and what it represents," Masson said. "I've seen cases where children feel like having a Jewish name, and the parents or the grandparents don't, or vice versa."

"This is the kind of problem we didn't think we would encounter at first," she continued. "But this is definitely something we ought to analyze more in the years to come. It is yet another interesting aspect of how complex a Jewish identity can be, even today."

Israel Briefs

Peres to meet Pope

Israeli President Shimon Peres is scheduled to travel to Rome to meet with Pope Francis on April 30. He will be the first high-ranking Israeli official to meet with Francis since he was elected to head the Catholic Church last month. Francis, 76, replaced Benedict XVI, who became the first pope in 600 years to step down from the post. The Latin Patriarch in Jerusalem has invited Pope Francis to visit Jerusalem. Patriarch Fouad Twal sent the new Pope an Easter greeting in which he invited him to come to Jerusalem and work toward easing the suffering of Christians in the Middle East, Israel Radio reported. Israel's ambassador to the Vatican, Zion Evrony, met with Pope Francis in March and formally invited him to visit Israel, formalizing an invitation issued by Peres immediately after Francis took office.

New attempt to break blockade

A pro-Palestinian group says its activists will soon stage a provocation aimed at ending the Israeli naval blockade on the Gaza Strip. The group will try to defy Israeli restrictions that prevent Gazans from fishing more than three nautical miles off shore. The Gaza's Ark Flotilla Freedom Coalition's effort will include Palestinians and foreigners. "Gaza's Ark is the evolution of the flotilla movement. We've moved away from sailing into Gaza with aid. We now focus on sailing trade out, because it's quite clear that if the Palestinians were able to trade, their dependence on aid would be diminished quite significantly," Michael Coleman, a member of Free Gaza Australia and the steering committee for Gaza's Ark, told the Inter Press Service. The United Nations has deemed Israel's naval blockade of Gaza to be legal.

More rockets from Gaza

Several rockets were fired from Gaza on April 4, but only one landed in an open area in southern Israel. The rest exploded within Gaza's borders. No damage or injuries were reported. It was the third consecutive day rockets were fired at Israel from the coastal strip. On April 3, two rockets fired from Gaza landed near Sderot as schoolchildren returned from the Passover break. The attacks came after Israel the previous night struck what the military called "two extensive terror sites" in northern Gaza, following the firing of three mortar shells on Israel from Gaza on April 2. Israel's ambassador to the UN, Ron Prosor, urged UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and the Security Council to condemn the recent rocket attacks by Gaza-based terrorists.

Israel wins Sunday's cyberwar

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — If anti-Israel hackers hoped, as they proclaimed, "to erase Israel from the Internet" during Sunday's "#OpIsrael" hacking attacks, they failed miserably, said Nir Goldshlager, Israel's most famous "white hat" hacker.

Instead of toppling and defacing government, bank and insurance sites, as they promised to do, the hacking groups, ostensibly associated with Anonymous, were able to attack only minor websites that were not well protected.

It was not for lack of trying, though. Although the statistics aren't in yet, Israel was clearly in the crosshairs of hackers on Sunday. Several Facebook pages, Twitter feeds and websites churned out updated lists of sites the hackers claimed to have taken down or defaced, and posts on social media sites made unsubstantiated claims such as "Anonymous causes Israel to lose $5 billion" in stock market losses (false) and "Tel Aviv loses all Internet connection" (also false).

The main tactic used by hackers to attack large government and financial sites was the denial of service (DDoS) attack, in which tens of thousands of connection requests are sent to a server at one time, in the hope of overwhelming the server's system and causing it to slow down to a crawl or to shut down altogether.

Tal Pavel, director of the MiddlEasternet site, which gathers intelligence on Internet usage and events in the Arab world, uncovered several sites where users could participate in DDoS attacks against Israeli sites by clicking on buttons. Each click generated thousands of connection requests.

In addition, Pavel reported a relatively sophisticated attack against the Bank of Israel, in which hackers compromised an Israeli site and inserted an agent that, when clicked on, launched DDoS attacks against the bank website.

The bank's site remained stable over the weekend, however, as did nearly all major Israeli sites. In some cases, sites were slow to load for a few seconds, but site administrators resolved the problems and restored normal operations within minutes. Government agencies, such as the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, sent out status messages and notifications several times on Sunday, assuring Israelis that despite the claims of hackers, Israeli government sites were running normally – as a cursory check of sites at random times during the day proved.

The DDoS attacks were an annoyance, said Goldshlager, an "ethical computer hacker" and the CEO of Break Security, and indicated "the lack of sophistication and knowledge of these teams." The exploits of the hackers were limited, "and they told many lies to enhance their reputations. In the end, though, the only damage they were able to do was to small sites that were not well defended, with the hackers taking advantage of well-known security holes in older web servers to enter systems and deface web pages or steal data."

Indeed, as the day progressed, it appeared that the hackers realized that despite their bravado, they were losing the propaganda war, being defeated by the facts.

"There were just so many inaccuracies," said Goldshlager. "For example, they claimed that they hacked into the site for the Israel Police, with the site's address police.gov.li. They may have hacked it, but by getting the domain mixed up – ".li" instead of ".il" – whatever it was they thought they were hacking, it wasn't the Israel Police site."

Goldshlager, who hacks into sites in order to find vulnerabilities, was unimpressed with the hackers' "script kiddie methods" of hacking, and was even less impressed by "their ridiculous claims" Websites, citing anti-Israel hacking groups, claimed 60,000 Israeli sites were compromised by 60 million hacking attempts.

The one success the hackers had was that of breaking into poorly scripted sites belonging mostly to small business, organizations and civic groups, and defacing them or stealing data from them.

"None of those sites is essential to the economy in any way, but for site owners it is obviously very annoying to have to clean things up and recover lost information," Goldshlager said.

By late Sunday, the cyberwar appeared to be winding down. "Our operators have been reporting via this account, non-stop for last 30 hrs," said a post on the #OpIsrael Twitter page. "We are taking a break."

Just when they'll be back, said Goldshlager, was unclear – but "rest assured they will return. This wasn't the first organized hack attack against Israel, and it certainly won't be the last."

Damascus synagogue looted, burned to ground

Yoel Goldman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The 2,000-year-old Jobar Synagogue in the Syrian capital of Damascus – the country's holiest Jewish site – has been looted and burned to the ground.

The Syrian army loyal to President Bashar Assad and rebel forces were blaming each other for the destruction of the historic synagogue, according to reports on Sunday.

The synagogue was said to be built on the site where the prophet Elijah concealed himself from persecution and anointed his successor, Elisha, as a prophet. It had been damaged earlier this month by mortars reportedly fired by Syrian government forces.

The rebels said the Syrian government looted the synagogue before burning it to the ground, Israel Radio reported Sunday.

The government said the rebels burned the synagogue and that so-called Zionist agents stole its historic religious items in an operation that had been planned for several weeks, the Arabic Al-Manar Television reported, citing the Arabic Syria Truth website.

The news came as Jews around the world marked the final days of Passover, the festival of freedom.

One of the oldest synagogues in the world, the shul was partially destroyed by Syrian government shelling four weeks ago, according to a video posted to YouTube. The video, uploaded by the Syrian opposition's military council, appeared to show that portions of the building and roof were blown off, with debris seen on the ground in front of the synagogue.

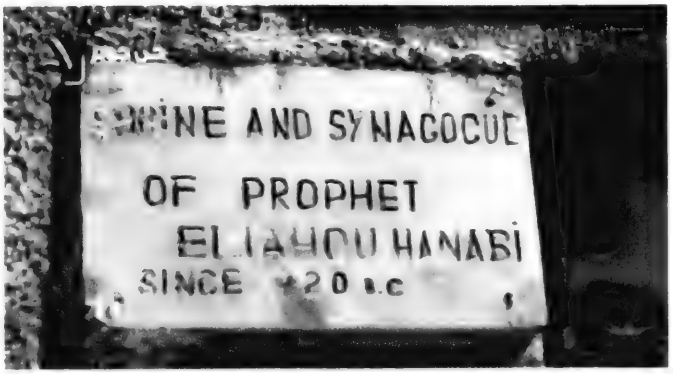
An inscription in English at the synagogue reads, "Shrine and synagogue of prophet Eliahou Hanabi since 720 BC," although the actual date of founding is disputed. One of the earliest mentions of the synagogue is in the Talmud, which states that Rabbi Rafram bar Pappa prayed there.

Another inscription, in Arabic, said it was the tomb of Al-Khizr, held in some Islamic traditions to be a prophet who travelled with Moses.

The synagogue served a large Jewish community in the medieval period, but by the mid-1800s only one Jewish family lived in the area. Still, Jews came from across the city to pray there, and there was a tradition of leaving the sick in the building in the belief that Elijah's spirit might heal them.

On April 1, people from both sides of the conflict said they were sad to see the site ruined.

"It's the heritage of the homeland regardless of religion, whether it's Jewish, Muslim or Christian," Maamoun Abdul-Karim, head of the antiquities and museums Department of the Syrian Culture Ministry, told the Associated Press. "It's the Syrian mosaic and the heritage of the people."



The plaque on the Jobar Synagogue

Abdul-Karim said some objects from the synagogue had been stolen last year, but that officials hadn't been able to visit the building in about four months because rebels control the area.

After establishing footholds in a number of Damascus suburbs last year, rebel fighters sought to push into Damascus through Jobar, where they now clash daily with government troops.

An anti-government activist in Jobar reached via Skype last week said the synagogue had been looted continuously during recent months and was damaged by government shelling meant to push rebels from the area.

He said he visited the facility in early March and found the main sanctuary undamaged.

"I don't know exactly what was there originally, but we know there were lots of old books and artifacts that are not there anymore," said the activist, who goes by the name Abu Hassaan al-Damishqi.

He said the site had been looted by government soldiers or thieves taking advantage of a lack of security.

"This is the history of the city, and it doesn't matter if you are a Muslim or not," he said. "This is the history of our country, so we all want to protect it."

Syria's Jewish community faced rampant discrimination after the establishment of Israel. With Jewish property rights severely limited, the synagogue was taken over and converted to a school for Palestinian refugees.

Only some 20 Jews are believed to live in Syria today, all of them in the capital.

In early 2011, Assad announced plans to rebuild about a dozen synagogues across Syria, including in Damascus – a move that was regarded in part as an effort to gain some support from American Jewry.

The nearly two-year-old civil war in Syria has caused damage to six World Heritage sites, according to Al Arabiya. UNESCO called for the protection of the country's cultural heritage sites last March, expressing "grave concern" at the time.

The UN estimates that 70,000 people have died in the fighting between Assad regime forces and Syrian rebels.

Amsterdam fined, taxed Holocaust survivors in hiding

JTA

THE HAGUE — Amsterdam fined hundreds of Jewish Holocaust survivors for failing to pay city taxes while they were in hiding or in concentration camps.

Het Parool, a local daily, reported on March 30 that many of the houses in question were confiscated and used by members of the NSB Dutch Nazi party while the Jewish owners were in hiding or in camps.

The city went after survivors as late as 1947, the report said. Other Dutch municipalities waived such debts, Het Parool reported.

The following year, the city agreed to reimburse half of what it charged to some Jews who were taxed in absentia. The city's archives contain 342 requests for reimbursement, according to Het Parool.

Charlotte van den Berg, a 23-year-old university student, discovered the documents about the taxation. She said she found them bundled with an elastic band in the archive section of one of the city's departments while conducting research on Jewish homeowners.

A city spokesperson told the daily that the city would investigate the matter, including how much money was collected from Holocaust survivors, together with the NIOD Institute for War, Holocaust and Genocide Studies.

About 75 per cent of Holland's pre-World War II Jewish population of 140,000 was murdered in the Holocaust, according to the Center for Information and Documentation on Israel, a Hague-based watchdog on antisemitism that is known locally by its acronym, CIDI.

Ronny Naftaniel, CIDI's senior adviser, told JTA that although the discovery was "shocking," there have been reports of the city's misconduct after World War II, though "few facts were known."

"The City of Amsterdam has never, to my knowledge, taken steps to correct its actions," said Naftaniel, the former treasurer of Holland's Central Jewish Board, or CJO.

Best-selling author tackles Holocaust

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Best-selling author Jodi Picoult takes on the Holocaust and its heavy topics of forgiveness and evil in her new novel, The Storyteller (Atria).

At the heart of this novel is Sage, a 25-year-old single woman who lives in Westerbrook, a small town in New Hampshire.

Jodi Picoult

As the result of a car accident, Sage has a very bad scar that runs down her face from her eyebrow to her cheek. Because of this, she is sensitive and introverted, isolating herself by working the late shift at The Daily Bread, a bakery run by a former nun. She believes she has the face of a monster.

Sage's parents are both dead. Her mother died only a few years ago, and for some reason that we don't find out until much later, Sage feels very guilty about it. After her mother's funeral, Sage begins a guilt-ridden affair with the funeral director, Adam, who is married.

Sage attends grief counselling, and it is there that she meets the recently widowed Josef Weber, a nice man in his 90s whom she recognizes as a regular morning customer at the bakery.

They soon become friends. Weber, a former teacher, is a regular churchgoer and choir singer who led the 4th of July parade as senior of the year. He is described by the townspeople as "close as you can get to being canonized while you're still alive... everyone's adoptive, cuddly grandfather."

One day Weber shocks Sage by asking her to help him die. "It's what I deserve," he says. She tells him she doesn't want to help him commit suicide, that she is not a murderer.

But, he says, he is one. He then reveals his big secret. He says he was a member of the Waffen SS, responsible for the mass killings of Jews and other civilians. He wants to seek atonement, he says, and wants one other favour from her: he wants her to forgive him for his sins.

Sage is Jewish, although she doesn't consider herself a Jew. Her parents never kept kosher or went to services. To her it seemed as though they followed an abridged version of Judaism.

Sage is shocked and confused by Weber's confession. Can you blame the Nazi who was born into an antisemitic country and given an antisemitic education if he turns out to be a monster? Yes, she believes, yes you can.

For there is one other twist in this multi-storied novel: her paternal grandmother, Minka, is an Auschwitz survivor.

Sage was 12 when she found this out. Her grandmother never talked about it. Sage has a vague memory of seeing the blurry tattoo on her arm and her grandmother explaining that it was her phone number, so that she wouldn't forget it.

As far as her grandmother is concerned, her life began when she moved to America. What happened to her during the war happened to a different person.

Minka is the storyteller of the book's title. As a girl, she started writing a supernatural story about an upior, a sort of Polish vampire, which is also a story about ordinary men who turn out to be monsters. Picoult is not subtle in her use of allegories and symbolism. The story Minka began ultimately saves her life.

Sage finally convinces Minka to relate her wartime experiences. Minka tells her about her time growing up near Lodz, Poland, and how they were rounded up and sent to the ghetto.

Minka's history takes up the middle of this novel, and is by far the best part. Some of it we've heard elsewhere before – the liquidation of the ghetto, the transportation to Auschwitz.

But Picoult (who is Jewish) spins it into an enthralling and original tale. In the ghetto, Minka's knowledge of German allowed her to work as a secretary in a textile factory run by a Schindler-like character named Fassbinder, who rescues mothers and children by employing them in his factory. At Auschwitz, she works at Kanada, the part of the camp where clothes and personal belongings are sorted. In order to distract her bunkmates from the pain and anguish at Auschwitz, Minka begins to tell them the story she created about the upior. She also decides to write the story down for posterity using the backs of photographs she pilfers from the inmates' suitcases at Kanada.

But she is caught by one of the senior SS officers who reads the story and is intrigued enough by it to find out how it ends. He makes her his secretary and forces her to write 10 pages of her story every day in a journal that he gives her. (He confiscates the photographs).

Minka knows she has nothing to lose. As long as she keeps writing her story, she knows, like Scheherazade of 1001 Nights, the officer will keep her alive.

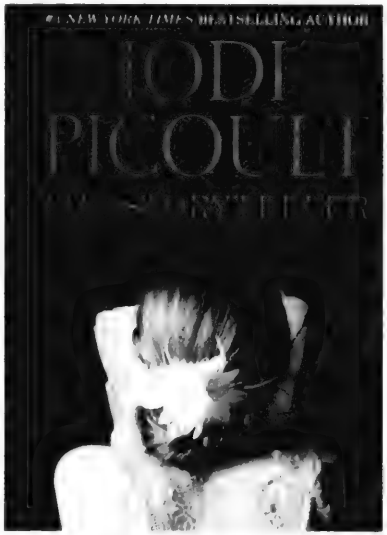
Inevitably, and somewhat obviously, Sage's grandmother's life and the life of Weber run parallel to each other.

Sage's biggest dilemma is whether to do as Weber says, forgive him and help him die, or betray him to authorities.

She is reminded that in Judaism, murderers cannot be forgiven, because the victim is dead and only those who've been wronged can forgive.

The duality of evil, the Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde aspect, is one of the major themes of this book. "Inside each of us is a monster, inside each of us is a saint," Weber tells her.

The other big theme is forgiveness. Can we forgive people for what they did to others? Can one atone for heinous acts?



Picoult says this novel was initially inspired by Simon Wiesenthal's The Sunflower. Despite some over-the-top symbolism and several distracting side plots including a love triangle, this is a thrilling read, although some parts are better than others. Minka's harrowing Holocaust account alone is well worth the price of admission.

From Dickens to Polanski at TJFF

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival runs from April 11 to 21 and features a first-class lineup of films.

A sampler:

The British novelist Charles Dickens, in Oliver Twist, described Fagin, one of his most loathsome characters, as "an old shrivelled Jew." But who was really Fagin? A figment of his fertile imagination? Or an actual flesh-and-blood figure? The mystery is apparently resolved in The First Fagin, which explores the topic in voluminous length, blending the historical record with dramatic re-enactments.

Fagin was modelled after Isaac (Ikey) Solomon (1785-1850), a pickpocket and a dealer in stolen goods. Like William Shakespeare's Shylock, Fagin validated antisemitic tropes and stereotypes about Jews. But in The First Fagin, directed by Alan Rosenthal and Helen Gaynor, Solomon is portrayed more benignly as a loving husband and father who was thrown into the maelstrom of crime by circumstances beyond his control.

Raised in London's impoverished East End, Solomon was born into crime, his father having been a criminal. Britain's rigid class system, as well as the endemic antisemitism of his times, left him with few options. Of course, he could have hewed to the straight and narrow. But having been exposed to malodorous influences, he embarked upon a crooked road.

The First Fagin unfolds in London and on the Australian island of Tasmania, a British penal colony where he, his long-suffering wife and children ultimately ended up. This informative and entertaining semi-documentary evokes a mean-spirited era when a man could be hanged for the slightest of crimes.

Royal Ontario Museum, April 12, at 3:30 p.m. and Sheppard Cinema 3 on April 18, at 5 p.m.

Roman Polanski: A Film Memoir, directed by Laurent Bouzereau, examines a tumultuous life of tragedy and triumph. Much of it unfolds in the form of an extended interview conducted by Polanski's friend, Andrew Braunsberg. File footage from events that shaped him rounds out the rest of this penetrating film.

Polanski was born in Paris, but on the eve of World War II, his Polish-Jewish parents moved back to Poland, which, as he observes, was "a big mistake." Caught up in the Nazi occupation, the Polanski family suffered greatly.

His best friend was deported, his mother was murdered in Auschwitz and his father was marched away. He recalls these traumatic moments with considerable emotion and tears. Polanski survived by going into hiding with compassionate Polish families. After the war, he was reunited with his father, who bitterly disillusioned him by taking a new wife and leaving him in the care of strangers.

The film also charts his fling with acting and his career in cinema in post-war Poland, his marriage to Sharon Tate – the victim of a brutal murder – his incarceration for having sex with a minor, and his flight to Europe after a warrant for his arrest was issued by the U.S. government.

Sheppard Cinema 5, April 15, at 4 p.m. and Innis Town Hall on April 21, at 1:30 p.m.

Re-emerging: The Jews of Nigeria, by Jeff Lieberman, takes a sympathetic look at the Igbos, some of whom observe Judaism and claim to be the descendants of one of the 10 Lost Tribes of Israel. Their narrative, however valid, is discounted by an American professor of Bible. They are a tiny minority. Fewer than 3,000 of 25 million Igbos have adopted Judaism.

In case you've forgotten, the Igbos touched off a civil war in the 1960s by declaring independence in the newly created but abortive nation of Biafra.

Lieberman interviews a succession of Igbos who converted to Judaism. "I know in me there is a Jewish soul," says an Igbo who was once a Catholic. "I'm done with Jesus." In subsequent frames, an Igbo in flowing red robes blows a shofar and a woman cooks a traditional Sabbath meal.

Sheppard Cinema 5, April 15, at 4 p.m. and Royal Ontario Museum, April 18 , at 3 p.m.

Franziska Schlotterer's fine-tuned German-language feature film, Closed Season, is a most unusual film. It opens in Israel as a young German tourist disembarks from a bus and tries engaging a kibbutznik in a serious conversation. In vain, he urges the German to go back home to Germany.

At this juncture, Closed Season flashes back to 1942. As Albert, a German Jew, tries to cross into neutral Switzerland from Nazi Germany, he is apprehended by Fritz, a German hunter and farmer. Fritz and his wife, Emma, cannot have children. But since Fritz needs an heir, he strikes a deal with Albert. In exchange for impregnating Emma, Albert will be allowed to remain on the farm, far from prying Nazi eyes.

At first, the sex between Albert and Emma is coldly mechanical. But as Emma learns to love it, she falls hard for Albert, compromising her relationship with Fritz and imperilling Albert. The film is relentlessly realistic in tone and the performances could not be better.

Sheppard Cinema 5, April 16, 6:15 p.m. and Bloor Cinema, April 17, 9 p.m.

My Father and the Man in Black is about a tempestuous relationship. Saul Holiff, a Canadian Jew from London, Ontario, was the manager of the legendary country singer Johnny Cash. When they met in 1958, Holiff did not know that Cash, a wild southern Baptist, popped pills and had a dysfunctional personality. Cash did not always show up at concerts, annoying Holiff, an organized and reliable person.

This absorbing film is directed by Holiff's son, Jonathan, a former Los Angeles-based talent agent.

Innis Town Hall, April 18, 9:15 p.m.

Hotel Lux, a surreal German/Russian production directed by Leander Haussmann, takes place in Nazi Germany and the Soviet Union and revolves around a hilarious case of mistaken identity in which a German comedian who mocked Adolf Hitler on stage is recruited to be Joseph Stalin's personal astrologer.

Innis Town Hall, April 16, 3:15 p.m. and Sheppard Cinema 3, April 21, 3:30 p.m.

Altina is the story of Altina Schinasi (1907-1999), a sexually liberated artist of Turkish and Greek descent who defied social conventions and made a life for herself at a time when society kept bourgeois women like herself on an extremely tight leash.

The scion of a wealthy tobacco merchant who invented the cigarette-rolling machine, a device that revolutionized the industry, she was smart, independent and lusty. Peter Sanders' film captures her spirit deliciously.

Innis Town Hall, April 14, 1 p.m. and Sheppard Cinema 5, April 15, 6 p.m.

Hamilton klezmer band celebrates 10th anniversary

Abigail Cukier
Special to The CJN

The members of Touch of Klez come from different backgrounds and appreciate various types of music, but what brings them together is klezmer.

"We are all from different walks of life, but this is what meshes us together," said violinist Charlotte Price.

The band was formed 10 years ago when founder and original bassist Michael Glogauer announced the idea from the bimah during Rosh Hashanah services at Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton. Glogauer has since moved to Toronto, and the original drummer, Murray Adelman, died in 2011.

Current band members include, together with Price, Alan Livingston on guitar; David Ludwin on bass clarinet; Michael Morritti on bass guitar; Ron Richter on keyboard; Dave Jones on drums; Rick Black on soprano sax, and musical director Jordan Abraham on accordion.

The band has played throughout the Golden Horseshoe, including at weddings and bar mitzvahs, as well as at a dental convention and a world bike race.

Touch of Klez has recorded one CD and will launch its second at its 10th anniversary show on April 28 at 2 p.m. at Beth Jacob. Actor and singer Michele Tredger will join the band that day.

Price is a classically trained violinist but stopped playing at age 19. When her children were young, she picked up the violin again and joined the Oakville Symphony Orchestra. She was a violin teacher for 23 years before retiring in 2000.

At age 69 and as the only woman in Touch of Klez, Price calls herself the matriarch of the band. Abraham, 42, who is the youngest band member, was in a children's choir that Price directed.

Most of the band's members had never played klezmer before they joined the band, and their tastes ran from rock to classical music.

Abraham told the Hamilton Jewish News that he sees a similar spirit between rock and klezmer.

"If you think of what was happening in music at that time, in Europe, it was Strauss waltzes, very subdued, very controlled. What klezmer was doing was like punk. The rhythms were heavy. It was pretty angry music."

But Price said being part of the band has given her "much joy and happiness."

"It is toe-tapping, as well as kind of mournful," she said. "It is our Jewish history on display. We get through adversity with our music. And if you watch people listening to the music, you see them get involved emotionally and physically."

For tickets ($20 and $15 for seniors and student) to Touch of Klez's anniversary concert, call 905-522-1351 or send an email to office@bethjacobsynagogue.ca. Refreshments will be served.

Touch of Klez will launch its second CD at its 10th anniversary show on April 28 at Beth Jacob Synagogue in Hamilton. (Wendy Schneider photo)

Biblical faces reconstructed for documentary

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

It's one thing to read about biblical times, but it would be something quite different to glimpse the actual faces of people who lived thousands of years ago.

Thanks to a combination of advanced technology and expertise, approximate reconstructions of biblical faces are now possible, based on ancient skulls excavated from relevant sites.

In a new, four-part documentary series titled Biblical Forensics: Real Faces of the Bible, television viewers across Canada can examine those faces and gain a deeper appreciation of the humanity of the individuals they represent and the lives they likely led.

Until recently, it's been difficult to do forensic work on human remains excavated in Israel, because of religious sensibilities. But thanks to CAT scans and cutting-edge 3D technologies, which minimize the need to handle those skulls, anthropologists, doctors and police facial reconstruction experts can now avoid upsetting religious communities. As a result, the documentary is able to capture the reconstruction of the faces of a Philistine woman who lived at the time of Delilah, an infant found in a sacrificial setting inside a millennia old Canaanite jar, a warrior who lived in pre-Canaanite times and a Galilean man who lived at the time of Jesus.

Simcha Jacobovici, executive producer and a specialist in investigative archeology, says the idea for the documentary emerged from a conversation he had with Prof. Israel Hershkovitz, head of the Dan Laboratory for the Search and Study of Modern Humans at Tel Aviv University. As chief anthropologist and co-director of the Misliya Cave project, Hershkovitz had access to the skulls and was an enthusiastic participant in the filming.

In each episode, two different methods are used to apply flesh to bone, one digital and one clay. "The forensic experts are using parallel methodologies, which means we have a built-in system of checks and balances, and it's interesting to see how close or far apart they end up," Jacobovici says. "I think we end up with very accurate reconstructions."

It was important to Jacobovici that the documentaries focus not just on the facial reconstructions, but also on the lives of the individuals they represent. "We wanted the forensic reconstruction to be a doorway into their lives," he explains. In the first episode, Delilah Revealed, which premièred April 8 on Vision TV, the forensic team works on the skull of a 3,000-year-old Philistine woman that dates to the Iron Age, the time of Samson and his lover, Delilah.

Victoria Lywood with some of the reconstructed faces.

"As we come face to face with Delilah, we also learn that her people, the Philistines, were Aegean, from the area of modern day Greece. So we get a glimpse into the Aegean presence in the Bible. What were they like? What did they believe? How did they dress and what kind of jewelry did she wear? It's not merely about recreating people, but bringing the past to life," he says. "Imagine, this is the first time the face of a Philistine woman was reconstructed. She lived at the same time and in the same place as Delilah, which means this is the closest we will ever come to meet Delilah."

In the episode titled The Man Who Saw Jesus, a Galilean man's visage is reconstructed. "If Jesus was as popular a healer as Christian tradition says he was, then surely this man knew him," Jacobovici says. "I don't think television gets any better than this!"

Montreal forensic artist Victoria Lywood was actively involved in the reconstructions and says the documentary Biblical Forensics is a stunning opportunity to gaze upon the faces of our ancestors. "I was struck by the face of the warrior, who is by far the oldest at 6,000 years," she said. "It's amazing to see these individuals, who look very much like us, and a wonder to think they had a sense of humour, similar ailments, family problems, loves and beliefs very much like us – only different due to the distance in time and technology!"

Each hour-long episode captures thousands of hours of time logged in anthropological, archeological and forensic research, she adds. "On this project, the 'sacrificial child' was completed within a week, but the larger sculptures took several months due to the amount of painstaking detail, size and new techniques used – several months, from start to finish." The images that result are approximations of specific individuals who'd be recognized by a close friend or family member, says Lywood. "The facial reconstruction is never a portrait," she cautions.

The episodes were shot on location in Israel, Tunisia, Montreal and Boston. David Berman, an actor on CSI, is the host of the documentaries and was a natural choice for this "biblical CSI," Jacobovici says. "Berman actually studied Jewish history in university and he's fascinated with archeology," he says. A variety of Canadian actors played parts in the reconstruction of the biblical stories, including David Dantes as Samson and Daiva Zalnieriunas as Delilah.

The next three episodes of Biblical Forensics will be shown on April 15, 22 and 29 on Vision TV. Check your local listings for screening times.

History made as Israel begins exploiting natural gas

The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Natural gas from the offshore Tamar field reached Ashdod last week after it was pumped to Israeli shores for the first time, four years after its discovery.

The Tamar deposit, discovered in 2009 some 90 kilometres (56 miles) west of Haifa, holds an estimated 8.5 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

Natural gas from the field was pumped to a newly erected facility on the coast of Ashdod, connected to the gas field via pipelines laid out on the ocean floor, 150 kilometres (93 miles) long and 41 centimetres (16 inches) wide.

From the Ashdod processing plant, the gas will start to flow into the Israeli market.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu hailed the event as "historic" and an "important day for the Israeli economy."

Israel took another step toward energy independence as the first batch of natural gas began flowing from offshore rigs through underwater pipes to an Ashdod intake centre. [Israel Sun photo]

This newly harnessed resource promises to be a major boon to the country's public and private energy needs. The gas from Tamar is expected to help meet Israel's energy needs for the next 20 years, Channel 2 television said, and will save the economy some NIS 13 billion (about $3.5 billion US) per year. Its ahead-of-schedule use will also save Israeli citizens some cash – lowering a planned rise in electricity costs to six per cent, less than originally planned.

The Tamar deposit, along with the more substantial Leviathan deposit, which was discovered in 2010, are expected to provide Israel with enough natural gas for decades and transform the country, famously lacking natural resources, into an energy exporter.

Leviathan, which boasts an estimated 16 to 18 trillion cubic feet of gas, is expected to go online in 2016, the approximate time when exports are expected to begin.

The discoveries are just a portion of the huge reserves in the Levant Basin, which the United States Geological Survey estimated in 2010 holds some 122 trillion cubic feet of recoverable natural gas.

European export market beckons

Compiled by CJN staff

The gas has started to flow from the offshore Tamar field, providing Israeli consumers with a domestic source of the vital resource, but the European market could be the ultimate destination for much of the fossil fuel.

Exports could begin in two to three years, but that timeline may be held hostage by geopolitical considerations. Israel had been hoping that a pipeline that would traverse Cyprus and Turkey would bring the valuable commodity to market, but tense relations with Turkey – an important ally only a few years ago – plus the ongoing Turkish/Cypriot conflict are considerable barriers to achieving that dream.

The introduction of an Islamist government in Ankara cooled relations with the Jewish state. Those ties were worsened in 2010 when Israeli commandos killed nine Turkish extremists on the Mavi Marmara, which was attempting to run the blockade of Gaza.

Israel's deputy foreign minister Ze'ev Elkin has gone on the record stating one of the country's top goals is reviving relations with Turkey. Three weeks ago, Israel Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu apologized for the deaths on board the Mavi Marmara. No doubt, more than natural gas exports were behind the move; Israel and Turkey share concerns over events in Syria, Iranian nuclear ambitions and mutual co-operation with NATO.

Turkey is demanding Israel compensate the families of the nine Turks killed on the Mavi Marmara.

Some analysts suggest that the apology and possibly compensation are part of a move to lay the groundwork for improved Israeli/Turkish relations and co-operation on a pipeline to Europe. With instability in Algeria and the rest of North Africa, Europe is facing a gas supply crisis and could be a natural market for Israeli supplies.

However, as the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs noted in a recent analysis, Israel has had experience relying on Egypt for its natural gas, only to see supplies from that country slashed drastically after the collapse of the Mubarak government.

The Israel/Turkey route is problematic in its own right. In December 2010, after Israel and Cyprus agreed to delimit their exclusive Economic Zones, Turkey's foreign minister threatened Cypriot efforts to extract gas from the Mediterranean basin. Turkey has been a self-proclaimed protector of the Turkish minority in Cyprus, invading and occupying part of the island in 1974. According to an analysis in Foreign Policy magazine, Turkey does not recognize Cyprus' right to negotiate an energy co-operation agreement with Israel until a settlement is reached with Cyprus' Turkish minority.

Asia might emerge as an alternative market, resulting in construction of a cross-Israel pipeline to the Red Sea port of Eilat.

However, the route to Asia through the Red Sea is also fraught with difficulties. Iranian naval forces patrol the area and Israel might have to beef up its own maritime patrols to ensure its ships can cross safely.

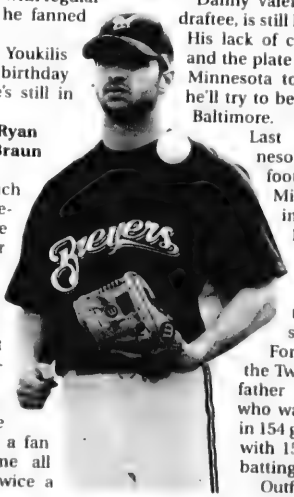
WINNIPEG — Perhaps it took the perfect storm to add a Jewish flavour that might finally allow the Blue Jays to fly high after a 20-year absence from post-season play. First, you call up the Miami Marlins, take the elastic off your ample bankroll and talk business.

Owned by Jeffrey Loria, 73, the Marlins finished last in the National League east division with a record of 69-93 last season, putting him in a salary-dumping mood. The Jays' owners were more than enthusiastic to try and prove what Loria couldn't – that you can buy a winner.

The Manhattan-raised Loria is a well-known art dealer and a member of the board of directors of the Benjamin N Cardozo School of Law of Yeshiva University in New York. He was in the market to sell a pair of pitchers, Mark Buehrle and Josh Johnson, and an all-star shortstop Jose Reyes.

Then, with spring training nicely underway, the Jays decided on Feb. 23 to add Phillies' right-handed pitcher Michael Schwimer, 27. At six-foot-eight and 246 pounds, he might at least intimidate a few hopefuls who get too comfortable at the plate.

In his rookie season, the Virginia-born athlete, who attended Hebrew school for a couple of years and had a bar mitzvah, came out of the bullpen 47 times and fashioned a 2-1 record with a 4.46 ERA, and he throws strikes with regularity. In 34.1 innings, he fanned 36.



Ryan Braun

Elsewhere, Kevin Youkilis celebrated his 34th birthday on March 15, yet he's still in demand because he's an old school kind of player who gives his all – so much so that the Yankees decided to sign the free agent to a one-year deal for $12 million (all figures US) to replace third sacker Alex Rodriguez, who is expected to be out for a least half the season.

Youkilis, an eighth-round draftee of the Red Sox in 2001, was a fan favourite, a three-time all star in Boston and twice a World Series champion who plays both third and first. The six-foot-one and 220-pounder was traded away last June to the White Sox and signed with the Yankees in mid-December.

Last season, his combined totals between Boston and Chicago were 122 games played, 438 at bats, a .235 average and 60 RBIs. But those numbers don't convey his true value. Long known as "The Greek god of Walks," he has an on-base percentage of .336, which accounts for his 72 runs scored.

Danny Valencia

The intense and gritty Youkilis is well-respected by opposition players and managers. His career numbers are more than respectable, too: the Cincinnati-born player boasts a .286 average, 133 homers, and 563 RBIs lifetime.

Another Jewish player who is always in demand is left-handed relief pitcher Craig Breslow – a real wandering Jew. This past winter, the 32-year-old hurler inked a two-year pact with the Red Sox for $6.25 million. Last season between Arizona and Boston, he had a 3-0 record and a sparkling 2.70 ERA.

The strikeout artist, who fanned 61 in 63 innings, has also spent bullpen time in Minnesota, Oakland, Cleveland, and San Diego. Not bad for a 26th-round draft pick, by Milwaukee in 2002.

Danny Valencia, 28, a former Twins draftee, is still hanging on in the majors. His lack of consistency at third base and the plate has seen him move from Minnesota to Boston, and this year, he'll try to become a regular Oriole in Baltimore.

Last season, between Minnesota and Boston, the six-foot-two and 220-pound Miami-born infielder got into 44 games and had 154 at bats, which resulted in a .188 average.

With a shortage of decent third-sackers in the majors this year, he's still viewed as a prospect.

For example, in 2011 with the Twins, the son of a Cuban father and a Jewish mother, who was raised Jewish, played in 154 games, driving in 72 runs with 15 home runs and a .246 batting average.

Outfielder Ryan Braun's numbers speak for themselves. Last season, the son of an Israeli-born Jewish father and Catholic mother stroked 191 hits, which included 36 doubles and 41 homers. He had 112 RBIs and a .319 average in 154 games. He can run, too, having 30 stolen bases.

Ian Kinsler, 30, the long-time Rangers' second baseman, may be on the move. Well, not too far. There is a better than 50-50 chance this year that he might shift to first base to make room for a few standouts in Texas's minor league teams. He still puts up the numbers, however, and can create havoc on the bases. In 655 at-bats last season, the son of a Jewish dad whacked 42 doubles, five triples, and 19 homers to go with 21 stolen bases.

Versatile right-handed pitcher Scott Feldman has left the Rangers, the only major league team he has ever played with, and was signed three months ago by the Chicago Cubs.

Kevin Youkilis, when he was with the Red Sox

The Kailua, Hawaii-born 30-year-old, who started 29 games last season, fashioned the type of numbers that perhaps indicate starting pitchers are in short supply. The six-foot-six and 230-pounder won six and lost 11 and had an ERA of 5.09, which explains why Texas declined its option. So Feldman goes from the heat of Texas to Wrigley Field, where the winds often blow out and create a different kind of heat for hurlers – from frustrated fans.

Jason Marquis, who split last season between the Twins and Padres, the sixth and seventh teams the right-hander has played for is much like the aforementioned Feldman. In 2012 the Jewish innings-eater won eight and lost 11, and had a bloated 5.22 ERA.

The 34-year-old first-round selection by the Braves in 1996 is always pitching on the edge, because he is constantly putting out fires. Nonetheless, he's a much sought-after player and a battler with a career won-lost record of 112-109.

Boston Red Sox catcher Rod Lavarnay, who is Jewish on his mom's side, is reputed to be a sure-fire major leaguer. In his rookie season last year, he only came to the plate 153 times and batted .157 along with eight doubles and two homers.

In the minors, however, he sparkled. The Yale grad, who won the NCAA batting title in 2007 with a .467 average, has also made the All-Star teams in both class A and in AAA Pawtucket, where he spent part of 2012 hitting .295 in 319 at bats along with 22 doubles, eight homers and 40 runs batted in.

Diminutive reserve outfielder Sam Fuld, 31, a crowd favourite, is back with Tampa Bay. Injury prone as a result of his aggressive style of play, he batted .255 last season in 98 at bats, mostly as the team's lead-off batter. The son of a Jewish dad and Catholic mom, he also has some speed, having stolen seven bases in 2012. He can distract and annoy entire opposition infields, be a pinch runner or substitute outfielder who will run through a wall to catch a ball.

New York Mets' first baseman Ike Davis, the son of former major-league pitcher Ron Davis and a Jewish mother from Lithuania, Millie, had his best season to date last year. Coming off an injury-riddled campaign in 2011, he bounced back by hitting only .227, but at six-foot-four and 230 pounds, his specialty at cleanup in the batting order is the long ball. Davis hit 32 homers and drove in 90 runs for the moribund Mets, who won only 74 games last year.

There are many more Jewish players in the minor leagues, of course, just waiting to make it in the majors. Coming soon, as they say on the marquees.

Heirs of N.Y. collector to get Nazi-looted art

JTA

NEW YORK – Two artworks sold under duress during the Nazi occupation of Germany will be returned to the heirs of a New York art collector.

The drawings are being returned to the estate of Michael Berolzheimer, who died in 1942 after escaping from Germany and settling in suburban Westchester County, according to a statement from the office of Benjamin Lawsky, superintendent of financial services for the state of New York.

In 2011, the Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO) of the financial services' department opened a claim to recover works for the heirs of Berolzheimer, an attorney who pursued a lifetime interest in fine art and served on the acquisitions committees of several art museums. The HCPO earlier had recovered three other artworks for the heirs and is working on 26 other restitution claims for the estate.

A Dutch antiquarian bookseller who owned one of the two drawings agreed to return it after learning of its origin. He had purchased the 1834 pen-and-ink portrait of a geographer by Reinier Craeyvanger at a Sotheby's auction in 2005.

The Kunsthalle Bremen in Germany is returning a drawing attributed to the 17th-century Italian artist Giacomo Cavedone. The museum acquired the drawing in 1941.

The works once belonged to an art collection of more than 800 pieces.

Berolzheimer and his family fled from Germany in 1938 after selling his art under duress, traveling first to Switzerland before immigrating to the United States. He lived in Westchester County until he died at age 76.

Infant contracts herpes from circumcision rite

JTA

NEW YORK — The parents of a Jewish newborn who reportedly contracted neonatal herpes following a controversial circumcision rite did not sign the required consent form.

According to the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, the newborn is the second in three months to contract the virus due to metzitzah b'peh, in which the circumciser uses his mouth to draw blood directly from a baby's penis.

The baby's parents did not sign the form advising that "direct oral suction should not be performed" because of the risk of contracting herpes, a recently required New York City health board regulation, and they have refused to identify the mohel, or ritual circumciser, who apparently is carrying the virus, the Forward reported.

At least 11 boys contracted herpes from the practice between 2004 and 2011, according to New York City health officials. Two died from the disease and two others suffered brain damage, the officials said.

Last September, the board of health voted 9-0 to require mohels to obtain the signed consent forms. Several months earlier, the city struck an agreement with local hospitals to distribute pamphlets about the ritual's dangers to the mothers of newborns.

Using oral suction to take blood from the area of the circumcision wound is common in some of New York's haredi communities. Other observant groups often use a tube for indirect oral suction.

Visually impaired director opens second play

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Audrey Amar knows that it's up to her to create her own theatre opportunities.

When the 24-year-old Thornhill, Ont. native decided she wanted to try her hand at directing a play, she did exactly that, bringing to life Cyrano de Bergerac, a French play she had loved for more than a decade. She formed her own production company, Seventh Method Productions, and put herself in charge of the costumes and set design as well.

And she did it all despite being legally blind.

"In my own circle, I'm the only director I know that has a visual impairment," she said. This posed challenges that most first-time directors wouldn't have to overcome. Cyrano, in particular, was a very physical piece, she said. "It was difficult to try to figure out exactly what worked for me."

She eventually settled on watching the performance through a digital camera, zooming in on actors from a distance to better direct them.

That was last year. Now, with one successful run under her belt, Amar is gearing up to open her production company's second season with off-Broadway hit Private Jokes, Public Places, written by Oren Safdie, son of Israeli-Canadian architect Moshe Safdie.

The cast of Private Jokes, Public Places, rehearsing for their run later this month. [Jayden Hsueh photo]

The play takes a satirical look at "academic pretension," and although the younger Safdie wrote it while studying architecture at Columbia University (from which he later dropped out), it has been altered to take place at the University of Toronto, where Amar went to school and where it will be performed – a concept that is an ongoing tradition with this play.

"It's fascinating to see these academic ivory tower stereotypes go at it," she said. "We see this play as much more than a critique of pretentious professors. It's more of a look at finding oneself and discovering your own character within these very strict guidelines of theoretical knowledge."

She said it's particularly relatable to students or post-secondary graduates. They chose the venue to better bring the play to life – it's being performed at the University of Toronto in the John H. Daniels faculty of architecture just in time for the end of the exam period.

Amar discovered the play in her third year studying at U of T, when she had to perform a monologue written by a Middle-Eastern Canadian or Asian Canadian for a course. She chose one from Private Jokes, Public Places.

"But just doing a monologue from this funny, exciting play didn't quench my thirst for it," she said. "It had to become a project for me."

This play is much more calm – physically – compared to her last one. This time, she found it was easiest for her to watch the actors rehearse from up close, often from about two feet away.

"I always make sure to let the actors know that I might not necessarily be able to see what they're doing sitting out in the audience," she explained. By standing close to them, she can overcome that hurdle.

Her cast has adapted to her style, and she said they joke that she's a very "visionary director."

Although she doesn't know any other directors with the same type of impairment, she sometimes refers back to lessons from her role model Jamie Graham, her high school drama teacher.

"As anyone gets older, their vision starts to waver in their reliability. Having him call an actor forward and saying 'do that again' so he could see it, worked for him," she said, adding that there's no blanket solution, but seeing him overcome his own needs showed her that anything is possible.

At that time, she was not considering becoming a director, and her teacher had even jokingly warned her against doing so. He had died while she was in the early stages of Cyrano, and so he never got to see her efforts come to fruition, but she did tell him when she was first thinking of trying her hand at directing.

"He sent me a vicious email saying, 'You know what kind of controlling, egotistical person you become when you direct,'" she said, referring to her high school drama classes – and assuring that she has changed her style since then. "And he said, in short, 'of course you should.'"

One of her professors at U of T told her that most theatre companies would likely be hesitant to take her on as either an actor or director because of her vision challenges, but it hasn't stopped her. She has even studied stage combat – she just has to observe a few times before joining in.

That's why she instead took another professor's advice to heart.

"Instead of waiting to be hired as a director or approached to be a director for a certain play, which granted someone might be hesitant to take someone who is visually impaired, I chose to make my own opportunities," she said.

She described the experience of directing as both exciting and thrilling.

"I had never experienced being able to see a vision become materialized," she said. "Taking something you have in your head, soul or heart and watching it come to be in front of you, is a jarringly beautiful experience."

She said she loves how many Jewish artists have been inspired by Jewish history, taking often painful stories and turning them into something beautiful, whether as a tragedy or drama, or even comedy.

"I'm glad I get to uphold that tradition in my own small way," she said.

Private Jokes, Public Places will be running from April 24 to 27 at U of T's faculty of architecture at 230 College St. For tickets, email privatejokes.tickets@gmail.com or purchase at the door.

Sustainable catering – food for thought

Have you ever thought of catering and sustainability?

Our family has recently been blessed with some wonderful occasions, among them, the birth of our first grandchild, the engagement of one of our daughters and the bar mitzvah of our youngest son.

When celebrating a family simchah, there's often a need for catering. Once you have picked a venue, you are pretty well committed to the caterer and what the caterer offer.

Whether at a shul hall, a stand-alone banquet hall or a condo party room, energy costs are embedded in the room-rental cost. The cost of electricity and natural gas used to prepare and heat the food is embedded in the catering fee.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

How would you like to be in a position to make the following offer to the caterer? "I am willing to pay $50 a guest. Are you willing to share with me the savings you enjoy, because I have brought you a solution that can be used in your food-preparation phase to reduce your electricity consumption in kilowatt hours, your electricity draw in kilowatts and natural gas consumption in meters cubed?"

If you were the manager of operations of a catering operation, would you accept such an offer? If you were a member of a synagogue building or house committee that provides a turnkey facility to an in-house or visiting caterer for a percentage of revenue, how would you react?

Would you use the savings to reduce the price to the simchah's hosts and attract more business by differentiating based on price? Do you keep the savings to improve your profit margin for the benefit of your synagogue members, catering hall owners and catering operation?

In industrial kitchens, ventilation on demand or demand-ventilation control is used to reduce electricity costs.

Most catering operations are industrial kitchens. They generally have an on/off fan-control system, with no ability to vary the fan speed.

Demand-ventilation control capitalizes on the fact that cooking appliances spend many hours in an idle or ready-to-cook mode that does not need the same ventilation rate as a cooking condition. Two-speed or variable-speed fans can achieve reductions in exhaust and make up airflow when appliances are not being used to capacity or have been turned off.

On-demand ventilation solutions can vary the speed of the fans based on temperature, smoke and steam or temperature alone. These systems increase fan speed when necessary and reduce fan speed when cooking decreases.

The longer a kitchen stays open and the higher the number of hoods used to ventilate the cooking area, the more benefit there is from a ventilation-on-demand solution and the shorter the pay-back period.

Enbridge has published a Boston Pizza case study that shows a 74.6 per cent annual natural gas consumption reduction was equal to 14,100 meters cubed and resulted in a $4,250 savings. A more detailed report stated that a 61 per cent reduction in electrical draw by fans was translated into about $1,500 in annual savings.

Perhaps your synagogue or caterer has an operational cost reduction opportunity to explore.

Yom Hazikaron

Growing up in Canada, we often ask ourselves at some point what is sacred to us and what we might die for. Of course, democracy, freedom and the Canadian way of life are generally the values thought of. This belief system, however, is mostly tested only during times of war. Nowadays the farthest thing from the minds of our Canadian children is that they will one day have to fight to preserve our way of life. We feel safe, and not surprisingly, embrace this country knowing that our progeny will likely not have to go off to war and, God forbid, be killed.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Living in Israel is different.

When children grow up anywhere in Israel, they will say: "I will fight and die for the State of Israel, democracy, and for all Jews." The thing is that along with a young person's answer comes the knowledge that as he or she grows, there is a likelihood this value will be tested. If you are born in Eretz Yisrael, you will likely serve in the Israel Defence Forces. If you do, and a war breaks out, which happens every few years, you could find yourself on the frontlines and at the other end of the enemy's gun.

Yom Hazikaron, the day of remembrance in Israel, speaks to this point. Essentially, as the siren goes off the night before and again the following morning, and that most uncomfortable sound bellows throughout the nation, the collective thinking is directed toward those men and women who were once children and accepted the responsibility of being Israeli Jews, and because of that, paid with their lives.

On Yom Hazikaron, when citizens from all corners of the state visit the graveyards of their sons and daughters, they also recall the Israelis who walked into a nightclub in Tel Aviv or attended a Passover seder in Netanya and were met by a bomb wrapped in nails and ball bearings intended to kill as many Jews as possible. They remember the victims of terror.

On Yom Hazikaron, April 14 to 15 (Iyar 4), it is important that, as Canadian parents and children, we consider, as well as we can, those we are remembering and why it is so important to do this. We remember the 26,000 people killed in Israel through war and terror since Jews were able to live outside of the Old City in the mid-1800s.

We are all called upon to think about the sacrifice Jewish Israelis and Bedouins are called upon to make as soon as they exit their mother's womb. Similarly, we are encouraged to think about the parents who decided to start a family, to give birth to a little boy or girl knowing full well that in 18 short years, a blink of an eye, the infants will walk away from their home with a machine gun hanging from their shoulder wearing fatigues meant to be as nondescript as possible, designed to make these sons and daughters look alike – because that's what armies require.

On Yom Hazikaron, consider all of this, and then remember that the very next day, Yom Ha'azmaut, Israel Independence Day, is celebrated.

And therein lies the special consciousness of our Israeli brothers and sisters. They are prepared to fight and die for Israel and our Jewishness, and we will celebrate until dawn because they are alive today as their children understand what is required of them – to give their lives if necessary.

Remembering the fallen

A young boy stoops at the grave of a family member on Yom Hazikaron in Israel. Throughout the country, Israelis paid homage to the 23,085 men and women who have fallen in defence of the Jewish state and to the 2,493 victims murdered by terrorists. As evening settled upon the country, mourning for the fallen gave way to celebration of the country's 65th Yom Ha'atzmaut. [Flash90 photo]

Manitoba students defund anti-Israel group

JTA

The University of Manitoba Students' Union (UMSU) voted to strip funding and official club status from an anti-Israel group on campus last week.

The move came a day after the University of Regina Students' Union (URSU) repealed its support for the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement, 14 months after becoming the first university student union in Canada to endorse it.

The UMSU vote on April 11 went against legal advice and bucked the trend among other student councils at other universities across the country, which in recent months have voted to divest from Israel, most recently at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus earlier this month.

The UMSU motion, which passed by a vote of 19 to 15, prohibits Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) from receiving funding from the student union or using student union facilities for club activities.

The resolution references the Manitoba Human Rights Code and accuses the club of "discrimination" and "harassment."

Prior to the vote, the undergraduate student union's attorney issued an opinion reading, in part, that "the actions of SAIA were well within the grounds of legally protected and acceptable political discourse." The legal opinion warned that barring the group could expose the student union to legal liability, the National Post reported.

SAIA has branches on most major campuses in the country and organizes the annual Israeli Apartheid Week. Supporters of SAIA have said they'll fight the decision.

Cdns. Appointed

TORONTO — Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler have been named to the advisory board of the Genesis Prize, a new $1-million award sponsored by the State of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel. It will be "given annually to an… internationally renowned professional…who is a role model in his/her community and who can inspire a younger generation of Jews worldwide," organizers said. Nobel Laureate Elie Wiesel and British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks are among others on the board. The first prize will be awarded in 2014. It's funded by the Genesis Philanthropy Group, which aims to enhance Jewish identity among Russian-speaking Jews worldwide.

Painting Found

ROME — A Marc Chagall painting stolen in 2002 was found in the home of ex-Italian soccer star Roberto Bottega. Police said April 8 that Le Nu au Bouquet, painted in 1920 by the renowned Jewish artist and worth $1.3 million, was found in Bottega's Turin home. He reportedly bought it in good faith from a Bologna gallery in 2003, unaware it had been stolen a year earlier from a U.S. yacht being repaired in Savona. The thieves replaced the original on the yacht with a copy and tricked the Chagall Foundation into giving the stolen artwork a new authentication. The Bologna gallery owner and two Romanians who worked on the yacht in 2002 are being investigated.

Citizenship Vote

LISBON — Portugal's parliament passed a law facilitating the naturalization of descendants of 16th-century Jews who fled because of religious persecution. The motion, submitted by the Socialist and Center Right parties, passed unanimously April 12 as an amendment to the "Law on Nationality." It lets descendants of Jews expelled in the 16th century become citizens if they "belong to a Sephardi community of Portuguese origin with ties to Portugal," said Jose Oulman Carp, president of Portugal's Jewish community, estimated at 1,000 to 1,500 people. Carp, who has lobbied for years for the amendment, called it "a huge development." The Portuguese Inquisition began in 1536 and saw mass expulsions and forced conversion to Christianity. Portugal had a Jewish population of about 400,000, many refugees from Spain, where the Inquisition started in 1492. Spanish lawmakers are said to be drafting a similar motion.

Quebec Minister Re-affirms Israel Ties

MONTREAL — Quebec International Relations Minister Jean-François Lisée reaffirmed the importance of Quebec's relations with the State of Israel at discussions held with Israel's consul general in Montreal, Joel Lion, on April 3.

They underlined the many affinities between the two societies, and focused in particular on economic relations and scientific and technological co-operation.

"The economies of Quebec and Israel are based on knowledge and innovation, as well as the vitality of their institutions, which offer excellent opportunities for trade and co-operation that Quebec would like to see strengthened," the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs said in a statement afterward.

Lisée, who is also the minister responsible for the Montreal region and La Francophonie, discussed initiatives that will make it possible in the coming years to expand collaboration between scientific and academic institutions and businesses in Quebec and Israel.

The province and Israel have already signed two agreements, in 2007 and 2008, that cover the scientific and technological, cultural, educational, health, economic and trade spheres.

Guess who is coming to Toronto?

Randy Bachman to rock Koffler Centre

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Iconic Canadian rock star Randy Bachman will be takin' care of business, helping to inaugurate Toronto's Koffler Centre for the Arts next month.

The singer-guitarist of The Guess Who and BachmanTurner, Overdrive fame is headlining the "Koffler Rocks!" fundraising concert on May 2 at the Artscape Wychwood Barns, 601 Christie St.

Also scheduled to perform are the Sadies and Melanie Fiona, among others.

The Koffler Centre has been in a nomadic mode since 2008. Its then-permanent home was lost when the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) was demolished, as part of a plan to rebuild and revitalize the BJCC campus. Koffler Centre maintains its head office in the Prosserman JCC's Sherman campus and offers arts courses there, too.

Over the last four years, however, the arts institution has held its major exhibitions around town in makeshift locations when needed.

This October, the Koffler Centre will relocate to a new 4,600-square-foot gallery and office space at Artscape Youngplace facility "in the historic and newly renovated Beaux-Arts building on Shaw Street just north of Queen Street West in the heart of Toronto's art and design district," according to Tony Hewer, a spokesperson for the Koffler Centre.

"We will be the anchor tenant in a multi-use arts building with other arts/ cultural/ social /community organizations, artist studios and more. We have signed a five-year lease with Artscape with the option to renew," he wrote to The CJN in an email.

A current snapshot

From the editor's desk...

The post-Pesach period is an ideal moment to take a snapshot of the state of the Jewish People. What better time than now – after Pesach, Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, quintessential occasions of Jewish Peoplehood – to take note of current "Jewish People" facts?

Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics on Sunday reported that the population of the country is 8.018 million, 6.04 million or 75.3 per cent of whom, are Jewish. Some 1.6 million, or 20.7 per cent, are Arab Muslims. The remaining 318,000 or four per cent of the population are neither Jewish nor Muslim.

Sixty-five years ago, when Israel was established, Israel's population totalled 806,000. The population of the country has grown by 10 times since it was founded.

The poignancy of the number of Jews who live in Israel today was noted by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu when he spoke last week at Yad Vashem during the national commemoration of Yom Hashoah.

"Today, for the first time since the establishment of the state, more than six million Jews live in the State of Israel. You, the citizens of Israel, are the testament to our victory. From the abyss of the Holocaust, we climbed to the peak of Zion. From a deep pit, we rose to a pinnacle."

Despite the steadily rising number of Jews who live in Israel, there are still far fewer Jews in the world today than there were in 1939 when World War II began, then between 17 and 18 million.

Prof. Sergio DellaPergola of Hebrew University of Jerusalem, perhaps the Jewish world's pre-eminent demographer, has just published his assessment of the world Jewish population for 2012. It was published by the Mandell L. Berman Institute North American Jewish Data Bank, at the Center for Judaic Studies and Contemporary Jewish Life, University of Connecticut, for the American Jewish Yearbook.

The executive summary of the study tells the story.

"At the beginning of 2012, the world's Jewish population was estimated at 13.8 million – an increase of 88,300 (0.65 per cent) over the 2011 revised estimate.

Prof. DellaPergola compares the growth in Jewish numbers to the growth of the global population.

"The world's total population increased by 1.26 per cent in 2011. World Jewry hence increased at about half the general population growth rate.

"The world's core Jewish population was estimated at 11 million in 1945... While 13 years were needed to add one million Jews after the tragic human losses of World War II and the Shoah, 47 more years were needed to add another million.

"The world's total population increased nearly threefold from 2.315 billion in 1945 to 7.075 billion in 2012. Thus, the relative share of Jews among the world's total population steadily diminished from 4.75 per 1,000 in 1945 to 1.94 per 1,000 currently." (My emphasis)

But as we know, as we have always been taught throughout our history, it is not the numbers of our people, but rather the nature of our resolve, character and behaviour that are ultimately determinative of our impact on civilization's progress. An eye-popping example of this observation was published last week by the unique, excellent news service, Israel21c. Based in Israel, this exclusively Internet service provides stories and features of the richly diverse, colourful, remarkably enchanting puzzle that is the State of Israel.

Compiled by veteran writer Nicky Blackburn, the story itemizes "the top 65 ways Israel is saving our planet." (Please see page 36.)

As Blackburn notes, "Israel is exporting far more than just technology. It's also sharing its experience and skills in a whole range of humanitarian and environmental fields to help people everywhere live better, fuller and healthier lives.

"From environmental breakthroughs that will help reduce greenhouse emissions and technologies that can increase food production and save vital crops to humanitarian aid missions in the wake of catastrophic natural disasters, Israelis are providing significant assistance" to countries and peoples around the world.

An IDF medical team traveled to Japan to assist victims of the devastating earthquake there in 2011. The Israeli efforts were among the list of 65 ways Israelis are "saving" the planet.

Blackburn itemizes 65 discrete projects by Israelis that make the planet a better place. The list is not comprehensive.

"There are hundreds, if not thousands, more worthy projects going on every day," she writes.

The full list appears on Israel21c.org. Read it. Be inspired. Take pride.

Student union endorses BDS

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A resolution to endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel passed by a bare majority at an April 5 undergraduate student union meeting at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus.

The vote came after the group Toronto Students for Justice in Palestine (TSJP) claimed to have 1,200 student signatures on a petition calling for the vote.

The endorsement brings the Scarborough Campus Student Union (SCSU) in line with the undergraduate students union at U of T's Mississauga campus, as well as the graduate student union at the school's downtown campus, which have both passed motions in favour of boycotting Israel.

As well, last month, the York Federation of Students at York University, the country's largest undergraduate student association, passed a similar resolution.

Adryan Bergstrom-Borins

The Scarborough motion – which passed with eight votes in favour, three against, three abstentions and one spoiled ballot – asks that the "SCSU commit to and demand that the University of Toronto administration also commit to identifying and divesting from companies that invest into and profit from Israel's war crimes, occupation and oppression as defined by the BDS campaign."

The 15-member SCSU represents 10,000 undergraduate students at U of T Scarborough.

"The University of Toronto Scarborough Campus [UTSC] is now proudly a part of the Palestinian-led global resistance movement to end the illegal Israeli occupation," TSJP co-president Sabrina Azraq told The CJN. "The UTSC community is now united in the global movement to non-violently pressure Israel to comply with international law and Palestinian human rights."

U of T spokesperson Laurie Stephens said the school's administration has received many complaints about the resolution. She said it has referred complainants to the SCSU while reminding them that while the council can endorse the BDS campaign, it can't force its members to pursue a particular course of action.

She added that the endorsement does not limit freedom of expression on campus and that the university will continue to protect the right of students to debate controversial topics.

But Adryan Bergstrom-Borins, president and founder of the Scarborough campus' Hillel, which fought against the motion, said she's concerned the vote will hinder the chance of dialogue taking place on campus.

Compared to last month's "secretive" BDS motion at U of T's Mississauga campus, this one was a lot fairer, in that TSJP spread the word about the vote, she said.

"It allowed a much greater dialogue to happen," she said, explaining that both sides were given equal time to make their case at the meeting.

However, in light of the endorsement, "whether this will continue in the same form of dialogue, probably not."

In the past, Hillel members have been invited to TSJP events, Bergstrom-Borins said. However, one event featured anti-Zionist activist Miko Peled, in which Bergstrom-Borins said he described Jewish history as a myth, and blamed "Israeli and Jewish values" for the ongoing conflict. When questioned, she said he responded that he does not talk to Zionists.

"I brought that up in my speech [at the council meeting]," she said. "I think BDS is definitely going to bring and legitimize that kind of dialogue that's really one-sided and not really open."

Azraq disagreed with the idea the vote will limit dialogue on campus.

"Joining in boycotting companies that profit off Israel's occupation will not hinder dialogue," she told The CJN. "In contrary, the BDS movement has brought forward great discussions and debates to our campus. We have always encouraged discussion on campus and will continue to do so. It is safe to say that we are all united in a desire for peace in the region."

SCSU president Abdalla Al-Baalawy, president also said he hopes debate won't end.

"I hope the debate that occurred on that day of the vote continues on our campus as we all strive for a more peaceful world and an end to all injustices being done by anyone or group on this earth," he told The CJN.

When Bergstrom-Borins heard about the vote about a month before it was originally scheduled to take place, she worked with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) to send letters to council members arguing against a boycott motion.

The vote had been postponed several times, but finally took place April 5. Although the meeting was on a Friday, Bergstrom-Borins said, the vote was scheduled for early in the agenda so it would occur before Shabbat and allow observant Jewish students to attend.

She said the council meeting room was filled to capacity for the vote, mostly with supporters of the motion, and that the vote even attracted a crowd outside the room. Although pro-Israel students were given equal time to speak, she described the atmosphere as somewhat hostile and "disturbing."

John Baird's courage

Subtlety, nuance, balance and honesty have never been strong suits of the Palestinian leadership. Their predisposition for exaggerated polemics was much on display last week when their propaganda machine went into punishing overdrive.

Their various spokespeople let loose a torrent of disparagement and condemnation of Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird for his deigning to meet with Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni at her office in eastern Jerusalem last week.

The PLO lodged an official complaint with our government, calling Baird's meeting "tantamount to complicity in ongoing Israeli violations of the international laws of war."

"Your recent meeting with Israeli officials in east Jerusalem may be deemed as aiding, abetting, or otherwise assisting illegal Israeli policies," chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat charged.

Invoking the usual lexicon of loaded, sinister, anti-Israel buzz words, senior PLO official Nabil Shaath characterized Baird's visit as "a slap in the face to the Palestinian people, particularly Palestinians living in East Jerusalem, who suffer from Israeli policies of colonial settlement expansion, ID revocations, home demolitions and evictions" (our emphasis).

To his credit, Baird was not cowed.

Canadian foreign ministry spokesperson Rick Roth told Agence France-Press that the meeting at Livni's office "doesn't change our longstanding position that all final status issues must be negotiated between the two parties. As guests, we were pleased to meet our hosts where it was most convenient for them."

The essential point about the location of the Baird-Livni meeting was the one that the Canadian government made. The final status of the geography of east Jerusalem must be negotiated by the Israelis and the Palestinians. That the Palestinians do not agree with Israel's characterization of eastern Jerusalem is widely known and simply confirms the importance of the overall need to reach a peace agreement.

The true substantive questions regarding eastern Jerusalem however are: why should an anomalous 19-year period – between 1948, when the Jordanian army expelled the Jews from their homes in eastern Jerusalem, and 1967, when the Jews returned – confer special rights upon the Palestinians to its exclusive legal entitlement? Why should the forcible division of Jerusalem by the Jordanian army in 1948 be enshrined as the permanent international legal status of the city, especially when, even as late as June 4, 1967, the Palestinians made no claim to sovereign control of eastern Jerusalem?

Baird got it right when he explained what the true purpose of the diplomatic exercise should be: "We're focused on trying to have an impact on the difficult and serious challenges, that being security for Israelis, an end to the conflict, and the legitimate aspirations for a state from those on the Palestinian side."

We commend his stand and his courage.

Yom Hazikaron 5773

We honour the memory of too many members of Tzahal who at too early an age gave their lives in defence of the State of Israel. We also honour the memories of the victims of terror. We should also remember the 11 Canadian Machal volunteers who gave their lives in the 1948 War of Independence. Former Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion said that the "greatest contribution the Jewish Diaspora ever made to Israel was in providing the Machal volunteers." They were:

• George (Buzz) Beurling of Verdun, Que. Canada's top World War II fighter pilot. Killed near Rome, May 20, 1948, in a crash of an airplane being readied for its ferry flight to Israel. Buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Harvey Cohen and Ed Lugech, first cousins, of Toronto. Served in Palmach Yiftach Brigade. Participated in the battles of Nebi Yusha and Malkiyeh. Missing and believed waylaid by Arab irregulars near Sarafand late June 1948. (Update per Maurice Moshe Sadeh: they were lost in the battle of Malkiyeh, on the Lebanese border, May 15,1948).

• Reuben Schiff of Toronto. Served on the Aliya-Bet ship Paducah. Killed July 11, 1948, near Abu j'Ab, while looking for his shipmate and Palmach comrade Lou Ball. Buried at Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Rubinoff of Toronto. Served with the Palmach in battles of Nebi Yusha, Malkiyeh, Operation Danny, and capture of Lydda and Ramleh. Wounded at Latrun July 17, 1948, and died en route to hospital. Buried at Nachlat Itzhak.

• Sidney Leisure of Toronto. Served in the 7th Brigade, 72nd Battalion. Killed Sept. 7, 1948, during Operation Hiram in battle for Tamra Hill in the Galilee. Buried at Nahariya.

• Leonard Fitchett of Vancouver. Ex-RCAF pilot. Served in 103 Squadron. Downed in his Beaufighter by anti-aircraft fire on Oct. 20, 1948, while attacking Egyptian-held Iraq el Sueidan police fortress. Buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

• Wilfred Canter (pilot) of Toronto; Willy Fisher (navigator) of Winnipeg; Fred Stevenson (co-pilot) of Vancouver. The three RCAF veterans served in 103 Squadron. During a night supply run to Sdom, on Oct. 24, 1948, their C-47 exploded in the air after an engine caught fire. Canter and Fisher are buried at Rehovot. Stevenson is buried in Haifa Military Cemetery, non-Jewish section.

This list was compiled by the late Eddy Kaplansky, Machal pilot and historian.

Endowment fund for Jewish education

In reference to Rabbi Jay Kelman's column, "Four questions about Jewish eduction" (April 4), about funding for Jewish schools, or the lack thereof, it brings to the forefront an issue relevant to everyone in the community and the need for a solution.

I've thought about this and wondered if there isn't a very simple solution to this issue. Namely: the creation of an endowment fund in the same way that universities such as Yale and Harvard have huge funds that provide financing for capital projects, research and scholarships. Their endowment funds are managed by full-time teams that create wealth from the initial principal, investing in all types of market vehicles. The funds have ballooned so large that the schools couldn't even spend the money they have, even if they wanted to. Compared to the state of Jewish education, couldn't two or three or 10 major Jewish philanthropists team up together to create a professionally managed fund so that the Jewish-education funding crisis could be virtually eliminated? Would this solution not be (a) the most financially viable for donor and school? This, because school and donor receive and share the created wealth from the fund. The fund's principal (in an ideal situation, by confirming Yale and Harvard's example) is not touched and ever increases its base through wise and professionally managed investing. And (b), is it not an enormous fulfilment of ensuring our communities, future health and commitment to our Jewish values?

Why can't this be done and why aren't our efforts directed towards this type of campaign, which has proven immensely successful in other areas of our world?

Court order releases women arrested at the Wall

Natan Sharansky proposes permanent compromise

Ron Friedman and Gavriel Fiske
The Times of Israel

The Jerusalem Magistrate's Court ordered the release of five women arrested for illegal worship at the Western Wall on April 11.

The women, including Women of the Wall director Leslie Sachs, were arrested for praying while wearing prayer shawls during the group's monthly Rosh Chodesh prayers at Judaism's holiest site.

"There were no grounds for their arrest," the judge ruled. "Any disruption that took place was not instigated by the defendants."

According to the Women of the Wall, Judge Sharon Lary-Bavly said during the proceedings that "to arrest these women... is likened to blaming a rape victim for the clothing that she wears."

Police said about 120 women, including Meretz MKs Michal Rozin and Tamar Zandberg, arrived for the prayer service.

"This reminds me of the darkest days of our history when Jews were dispossessed of religious artifacts and not allowed to worship," said Sachs after she was arrested.

"This is completely irrational. The world didn't collapse when women weren't arrested last month. Police should have behaved similarly this time," said Rozin. "It is unfathomable that in 2013, Israel is the only place in the world where Jewish women are arrested for praying."

Western Wall Rabbi Shmuel Rabinowitz, for his part, condemned the prayer gathering as a deliberate provocation at a time when authorities are working on a finding an acceptable solution to the issue.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is said to be considering a proposal by the head of the Jewish Agency, Natan Sharansky, to establish an egalitarian prayer plaza along part of the Western Wall.

"That they came this morning, despite the settlement efforts that Sharansky is trying to promote, is the clearest testimony that their goal is to cause dispute and hurt feelings by increasing polarization and turning the Western Wall into a battlefield for zealots," Rabinowitz said, according to Ma'ariv. "Instead of looking at this holy place as holy ground, they are turning it into a place of contention, and their behaviour fuels hatred and dispute."

A man who tried to burn pamphlets distributed by the women and a haredi woman who yelled abuse at the worshipers were also detained, Israel Radio reported.

Police said they would arrest other women who they videotaped transgressing the ban on women reading from the Torah or donning prayer shawls at the holy site.

"The events at the Western Wall today are one more reminder of the urgent need to reach a permanent solution and make the Western Wall once again a symbol of unity among the Jewish People, and not one of discord and strife," the Jewish Agency said in a statement.

Sharansky's proposal has reportedly been approved in principle by the government, haredi authorities, the Women of the Wall and leaders of the Reform and Conservative movements in the United States. However, Sachs said the "extremely ambitious" proposal could take years to implement – "if ever."

Sachs told Israel Radio that her organization was campaigning among Knesset members to reverse the legal amendment under which women are barred from certain practices at the Western Wall.

Sharansky is said to want to designate the area currently known as Robinson's Arch for egalitarian services, to rename it as part of the Western Wall, to change it from a paid-entry tourism area to an open prayer site and to directly connect it to the main Western Wall plaza. The Times of Israel has learned that the plan would see development of the Robinson's Arch area to be equal in size to the present Western Wall prayer plaza and that both sections would share a single entrance.

Sharansky told Ynet News on April 10 that the plan had been presented "to the government ministers, to the leaders of the Jewish movements in the United States, to the Western Wall rabbi, and each of them have their own reservations, but they all understand that the situation in which the Western Wall is a place of conflict and dispute must end and that it must be rebuilt as a uniting place. In this move we are providing a possibility to recreate agreement and a wide common denominator around the Western Wall."

Rabbi Rabinowitz said that while the new prayer area "does not match" his worldview, he supports the idea of "one site of prayer" and said that the haredi community "can live with this solution." The Western Wall "has to unite the Jewish People," he told Israel Radio. "It belongs to all the Jewish People... I'm seeking solutions that everyone can live with."

If the proposal "is accepted by everyone," if it proves feasible from archeological, security and all other perspectives, and if it essentially moves the disputed prayer arrangements away from the area that is today designated as the Western Wall, Rabinowitz said, that would be acceptable to him. "If not," he added, "then what have we achieved?"

On April 10, the Women of the Wall offered support for the plan. Sharansky's proposal was "a wonderful message for Israelis, for Jews from abroad, for everyone," the group's leader Anat Hoffman said, praising him for thinking outside of the box and looking for a real solution.

Hoffman, whose group has led the struggle to open the Western Wall to nontraditional prayer, spoke to the Forward hours after Sharansky presented to American Jewish leaders part of his proposal to resolve the dispute.

The idea is "very ambitious," Hoffman said, and represents a compromise, even if it wasn't what the group had been hoping for. "You don't always have to be right, you have to be smart – and compromise is a sign of maturity and understanding what's at stake here," Hoffman said.

But Sachs sounded markedly less upbeat, worrying that the Sharansky solution would not be practicable in the short term while also noting that the group hadn't seen Sharansky's final specific suggestions, "although we were consulted" as the proposal was being prepared.

In a statement, the Jewish Agency said Sharansky hoped the proposal would "decrease the heightened tensions at the Western Wall."

Sharansky said in the statement: "One Western Wall for one Jewish People."

Hoffman expressed concern over what could happen before the idea is implemented, alluding to statements by Jerusalem's police commissioner Yossi Pariente, who warned women against saying Kaddish. A women reciting Kaddish could be arrested, the officer explained.

Rabbi Rabinowitz said that women would not be arrested for saying Kaddish — after MK Alisa Lavie (Yesh Atid) intervened — but then Pariente stated once again that the Jerusalem police would enforce the law.

It was not a question of agreements between the sides involved, but of a court order that needed to be upheld, he said.

Sharansky's suggested enlarged prayer section would be equal in size to the current men and women's sections, the Forward reported.

As part of a previous compromise, Robinson's Arch is open at certain times for egalitarian prayer, but it is inside an archeological site and a fee is charged for entrance. The new proposed area would be open at all times without a fee and be essentially an extension of the main prayer section at the Wall.

Israel Radio reported April 10 that the plan would involve changing the official name of the Robinson's Arch area, named after early 19th-century American biblical scholar Edward Robinson.

Sharansky stressed that the plan, which would involve renovation work in a politically and religiously sensitive site, would, in order to "not spark a conflict" with the Muslim world, not "touch one stone" of the Mughrabi Bridge, which connects to the Temple Mount plaza and is adjacent to both the current Jewish prayer area at the Wall and to Robinson's Arch.

The question of women's and nontraditional prayer at the Western Wall is a divisive issue in the relationship between Israel and Jews in the Diaspora, especially in the United States, where most Jews follow Reform or Conservative egalitarian practice. That's currently forbidden at the Western Wall.

Western Wall regulations dictate that women cannot wear tallits in the same manner as men, as it contravenes the "local custom" determined by the Wall's chief rabbi. In 2003, the High Court of Justice upheld a government ban on women wearing tfillin or tallits.

Haters can't see good in Israel, but we should

On Sunday, March 17, CBC Radio broadcast an interview I did on The Sunday Edition with Michael Enright discussing my new book, Moynihan's Moment: America's Fight Against Zionism as Racism.

The interview, entitled "Daniel Patrick Moynihan's Defence of Zionism," was classic Enright, who is a national treasure. He was well prepared. He asked intelligent questions. He set a warm, thoughtful tone. The conversation flowed, and the time flew. Afterward, one of the Montreal studio hosts told me the interview triggered many discussions among CBC reporters and technicians, who appreciated my distinction between criticizing Israel, which is a legitimate, democratic act, and demonizing Zionism, which is usually a totalitarian and destructive act. But, inevitably, because we mentioned the Z-word, Zionism, in a positive context, the brickbats flew.

Gil Troy

in Montreal

Two weeks later, Enright wrote on his website: "My conversation with Prof. Troy touched a nerve with many of our listeners, and we received a lot of mail about it." He then excerpted six letters, all hostile. "While Zionism might not be racism it is exclusionary and elitist... One might say 'ethnicist,'" wrote a Vancouverite, claiming that had we been discussing apartheid-era South Africa, "Dr. Troy might well have been an apologist for that whites-only regime."

"I'm a Jew and I am ashamed by Israel's war crimes and inhumanity," wrote another Vancouverite. Nationalism is a form of racism in this day and age." And someone from Toronto, self-describing as "Israeli-born" – but not Israeli! – called me an "apologist," saying : "Jewish nationalism – if that is Zionism – is untenable as it has proven that it cannot accommodate the first principles of a 'liberal democracy': protect the rights of, and give voice to, the minorities that live amongst you."

Reading these comments, I'm struck once again by Israel's critics' hatred and lack of nuance. They cannot accept any conversation that doesn't demonize Israel. They never attack Palestinian nationalism, but cannot abide Jewish nationalism. They ignore Israel's complex security situation as well the many strides Israeli Arabs have made, while Jews in Arab states were oppressed and expelled. Their disdain is essentialist – overwhelming, all-encompassing and unabating. Whether or not they're Jewish or Israeli is irrelevant – Jews and Israelis can be just as wrong as Canadians.

But what also struck me was the CBC sample's one-sidedness. My guess is that by now some readers have decided that this was typical media bias, trying to correct for the fact that the CBC, for once, broadcast something positive about Israel. I actually assumed something else: that this sample reflected the letters that came in, which is symptomatic of a broader Jewish community problem. As a community, we all too often are expert at complaining, but far less adept at thanking. My guess is that Enright received few positive letters or emails, and that he, being an extraordinarily fair-minded radio host, revealed that in his choice.

I can take care of myself, but I shouldn't have to. We should learn to applaud straight shooters such as Michael Enright as frequently and as heartily as we denounce the haters. Hakarat Hatov, recognition of the good, is a core Jewish concept. It emphasizes the importance of emphasizing the positive. It's also a key media tactic. Thanking heroes and appreciating good people who simply do their jobs well builds goodwill.

More broadly, it reflects the kind of worldview we should embrace. Yes, I'm well aware of the haters out there, the York University fools who want to boycott Israel, the liars who smear the Jewish state, the demonizers who repudiate only one form of nationalism – Zionism.

But I refuse to spend my whole life fighting them. I want to delight in Zionism's success. I want to toast Israel's achievements. I want to rejoice in our good fortune to be living in the era of the third Jewish commonwealth.

As we celebrate the state of Israel's 65th birthday, knowing that Zionism, Judaism and the Jewish national link to the homeland are so much older, let's commit ourselves to learning about the good not just the bad, to accentuating the positive as much as possible, and to starting to show gratitude even more frequently than we complain.

It will not only improve our standing in the big wide world out there, it will make us all happier with ourselves.

Next year, keep it simple!

The seders are over and the matzah crumbs have been swept away. This is the first year I don't have a lingering feeling of bondage.

On our flight to Vancouver to spend Pesach in a yurt on Gabriola Island with friends and our son at UBC, we ran into a large group of Jews on their way to Whistler, where a ski-and-seder week package looked incredibly alluring. We remembered the year we also considered escaping to a Caribbean island offering a sand-floor synagogue seder.

The week before Pesach we saw countless YouTube items and Facebook posts lamenting how much people "hate" Passover. When did Pesach become so overwhelming that hotels kosher their kitchens and cruises offer seders so that we can run away from home?

Taping shut the closets, turning on the house alarm and going far, far away is one alternative to the cleaning, koshering and expense and – dare I say it – obsession over Pesach food. Pesach bagels, brownie mixes, and the worst excuse for breakfast cereal I have ever seen or tasted feel like some kind of slavery.

But simplifying Pesach is another way to deal with the holiday.

I know that some of these suggestions will not work for some Jews. Still, I respectfully suggest five tips for an easier Passover next year. Take what you can and throw the rest away with your left-over matzah.

• Skip all processed food. Your food bill will be cheaper and you will feel less overwhelmed in the store aisles. Do you really need duck sauce for one week? Kosher for Passover noodles that you keep promising you'll never buy again because you end up throwing out most of the gloopy mess? Learn to make easy blender mayonnaise with eggs and oil. Throw some cherry tomatoes, olive oil and salt into the broiler and you've got tomato sauce. Toast some chopped nuts and matzah farfel in melted butter and honey and you've got granola.

• Learn which foods need to be marked with a label and which don't. Don't get sucked into the kosher for Pesach product vortex. This year, I saw kosher for Passover pre-mixed salt water for your seder. A clever marketer turned Passover anxiety into profit.

• Consider kitniyot – those pesky legumes that Ashkenazi Jews "do not eat." I was once a triumphalist kosherer-than-thou ethnocentric Askenazi Jew about this, believe me. I wouldn't even eat green beans –which are a vegetable and not a bean – because of their name. But the year we lived in Israel changed my mind and habits thoroughly. If it's good enough for the Sephardi chief rabbi, it's good enough for me. We met many observant Ashkenazi Jews in Jerusalem who do eat kitniyot because it is now the overriding "custom of Israel." The Conservative movement has ruled that Ashkenazi Jews may eat kitniyot. There is even a "Kitniyot Liberation Front" website populated by Orthodox Jews giving serious challenge to an eastern European tradition that has outlived its original concern: the accidental mixing of wheat kernels into rice. We can now buy hermetically sealed and separated packages, so what's it about? Are we concerned because it can be made into a bread-like product or mistaken for wheat, or rise if it gets a bit of water thrown on it? But not for Sephardi Jews? Tortillas look a lot like matzah, less bread-like than those packaged spongy roll-up cakes. And when my cornmeal gets a bit of water, it doesn't rise, it becomes polenta.

in Toronto

• Go outside every single day and walk. It's a spring holiday but how can we feel it if we are constantly indoors? Your stomach will thank you. And your ability to bless the flowers and sun and sky once again will be activated against the post-seder sluggishness that arises from eating too much heavy food.

• Invite your guests over for a pre-seder group cooking session. If your kashrut and theirs are the same, swallow your pride and do a potluck. Are we using resentful hours in the kitchen alone to assure our egos that ours are absolutely the best matzah balls in the universe and someone else's cannot possibly be as good?

We are in the countdown days leading up to Shavuot. Personally, I'm counting down toward next Passover for a holiday I can learn to simply love, by keeping it simple.

Ulysses S. Grant's infamous order

On the eve of his death in 1885, Ulysses S. Grant, a U.S. Civil War hero and a former American president, wrote The Personal Memoirs of Ulysses S. Grant. The two-volume work, written with stylistic verve, was comprehensive yet self-serving, excluding a telling episode that could have sullied his reputation as a great American figure.

Left out of Grant's memoir was an official command he issued on Dec. 17, 1862, when he was a general on the Union side of the civil war in the United States.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Put plainly, General Orders No. 11 was the most antisemitic edict ever issued by a U.S. government official. Described as "that obnoxious order" by his wife, Julia, it was promptly rescinded by the president, Abraham Lincoln.

Grant signed General Orders No. 11 at his headquarters in Holly Springs, Miss., as Lincoln prepared to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, which would free African-American slaves. The notorious order expelled "Jews as a class" from the department of Tennessee, which consisted of Mississippi and parts of Tennessee and Kentucky.

Jonathan D. Sarna examines this order in exhaustive fashion in When General Grant Expelled the Jews (Nextbook). A professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University, he claims it set the stage for the empowerment of Jews in the United States.

With wartime shortages and imbalances between supply and demand posing a problem for the North's economy, Grant signed it in an attempt to eliminate black marketeers and restrict commerce with the Confederacy.

It read: "The Jews, as a class violating every regulation of trade established by the Treasury Department and also department orders, are hereby expelled from the department with twenty-four hours from the receipt of this order."

By Sarna's reckoning, it affected fewer than 100 Jews in the vicinity of Grant's army in northern Mississippi, representing a miniscule proportion of the 25,000 Jews living in the Confederate states in the 1860s. Many more Jews were unaffected by it because communications between Grant's headquarters and the military command were poor.

One of the first Jews to contest it was Cesar Kaskel, a Prussian immigrant who resided in Paducah, Ky. Within hours of its release, he and his brother, as well as their friends, sent Lincoln a telegram of protest, which, Sarna speculates, he probably never saw.

Kaskel also mailed a strongly worded letter to newspaper editors. The Associated Press picked up the story and, in modern parlance, it went viral.

As the New York Times commented, "All swindlers are not Jews. All Jews are not swindlers."

On Jan. 3, 1863, Kaskel was granted an audience with Lincoln arranged by a Republican congressman, John Addison Gurley, who represented a district in Cincinnati.

The exchange between Kaskel and Lincoln was biblical and condescending in tone.

Lincoln: "And so the children of Israel were driven from the happy land of Canaan?"

Kaskel: "Yes, and that is why we have come unto Father Abraham's bosom, asking protection."

Lincoln: "And this protection they shall have at once."

Sarna is unsure whether this fabled and paternalistic conversation even took place. Nevertheless, Lincoln immediately ordered his top general, Henry Halleck, to countermand Grant's order, which seems to have generated a frisson of antisemitism in the Union army.

Halleck followed through and the order was summarily cancelled. Unofficially, Halleck's assistant adjutant general, John Kelton, told Grant it had been too sweeping in nature.

Sixteen days later, Halleck wrote Grant a letter marred by an anti-Jewish slur: "The president has no objection to your expelling traitors and Jew peddlers… but as it in terms proscribed an entire religious class, some of whom are fighting in our ranks, the president deemed it necessary to revoke it."

According to Sarna, General Orders No. 11 was not Grant's first foray into antisemitism.

In July and November of 1862, eager to strike a blow against speculators in his district, he ordered subordinates to pay "special attention" to Jewish traders and keep out "the Israelites."

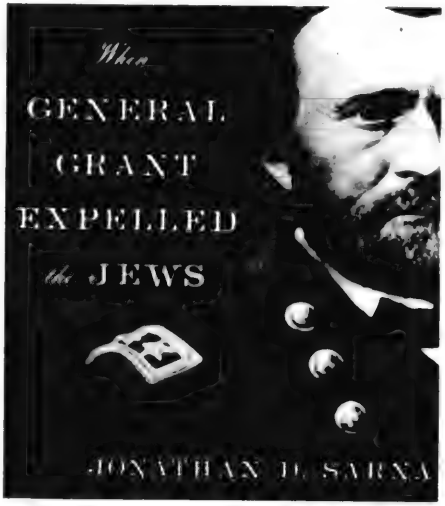
But when a subordinate ordered "all cotton speculators, Jews and other vagrants" to leave Holly Springs within 24 hours, Grant rescinded this draconian order.

Why, then, only a month later, did Grant issue General Orders No. 11? Sarna offers a plausible explanation.

After the Civil War, Grant, who had accepted Robert E. Lee's surrender at Appomattox on April 9, 1865, was transformed into a national hero and appointed general of the armies of the United States.

Shortly after the Republican party nominated him as its presidential candidate, General Orders No. 11 came to haunt him, as a highly critical and anonymously-written pamphlet, General Grant and the Jews, circulated.

In a damage-control manoeuvre designed to save his candidacy, Grant's aide, Adam Badeau, claimed that the order had been directed against "evil… persons whose religion was in no way material to the issue."



And in a letter to a Jewish war veteran and B'nai Brith leader, Grant distanced himself from the order and forswore prejudice.

When Grant took his oath of office on March 4, 1869, he was, at 46, the youngest man ever to become the U.S. president.

In an effort to atone for his "sin," he initiated a policy of rapprochement with the Jewish community, appointing a succession of Jews to civil service positions.

"As a result, Jewish participation in government expanded during Grant's presidency," writes Sarna. "Jews held more government offices than ever before under Grant."

Grant, in this ecumenical spirit, became the first president to attend a synagogue dedication (in Washington, D.C.), and spoke up on behalf of oppressed Jews in Russia, even though Russia had stood by the Union side during the Civil War and had sold Alaska to the United States on favourable terms in 1867.

News of Grant's death was mourned by many Jews. By then, having disavowed General Orders No. 11, Grant had rehabilitated himself.

Striking a positive note, Sarna observes that his reversal transformed Grant "from enemy to friend, from Haman to Mordecai, from a general who expelled 'Jews as a class' to a president who embraced Jews as individuals."

The entire affair, he concludes, "reminds us that even stellar figures in history can learn from their mistakes."

THERE'S NOTHING EXCITING ABOUT IT. UNLESS YOU'RE EXCITED BY MAKING MONEY.

Hebrew U Friends to honour Morgan Freeman

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

He's driven Miss Daisy, helped outfit Batman, played "Red," the man who knew how to locate certain items from time to time in the fictional Shawshank state penitentiary, and was everybody's favourite film version of God incarnate in Bruce Almighty.

Now, Academy Award-winning actor Morgan Freeman is coming to Toronto to be honoured for his work and philanthropy by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) on May 6 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. He will be presented with the charity's Key of Knowledge Award for his dedication to combating racism and "promoting knowledge and education worldwide," according to CFHU.

Morgan Freeman

And yes, the 75-year-old actor is also scheduled to speak with his inimitable dulcet tones to those in attendance at the organization's Celebration of Excellence soirée.

Rami Kleinmann, CFHU's president and CEO, told The CJN that his charity became interested in honouring Freeman while researching candidates for its award this year because the septuagenarian actor is a huge proponent of higher learning and study of science to benefit all humanity.

As such, CFHU wanted to bring in a guest honoree who was from "outside" the Jewish community, yet who could appreciate the work being done by scientists and researchers in Israel.

"We heard about all the philanthropic work [Freeman] does in the areas of science and advancement of knowledge, and decided to approach him," he said.

In his private life, Freeman is involved with multiple charities across a spectrum of causes including Plan!t Now, a disaster relief fund; Earth Biofuels, a non-profit that promotes the use of clean-burning fuels in America, and the Campaign for Female Education.

While early attempts to woo the film star were gently rebuffed, the CFHU eventually hit a soft spot for the actor.

One CFHU staffer had a relationship with renowned movie producer and director Jake Eberts – a prior honoree and also a friend of Freeman's from their work together on Driving Miss Daisy.

The same staff member also is a friend of documentary film director and producer Paul Saltzman, with whom Freeman worked on Prom Night in Mississippi in 2009.

This information, plus the fact that the Hebrew University of Jerusalem was co-founded by Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud, and has produced medicines such as the cancer-fighting Doxil pill and Alzheimer's medication, Exelon, to name just two innovations of benefit to humanity – convinced Freeman to accept the honour, Kleinmann said.

In a statement, Freeman said he's looking forward to attending the gala.

"There is a saying: 'He who opens a school door, closes a prison.' Some of the greatest problems in our world today, from racism, to the environment, health, malnutrition and disease, are caused due to a lack of education and knowledge.

"This is why I have dedicated so much of my time to promoting education around the world, and it is why I am proud to receive the Key of Knowledge Award from Canadian Friends of The Hebrew University – an organization that celebrates learning and academic excellence."

Proceeds from the event will go toward funding the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), which conducts research into cancer and Alzheimer's disease and related brain disorders through joint research between Hebrew U and Canadian partner institutions such as McGill University, the Rick Hansen Foundation and the University of Toronto.

The Morgan Freeman Scholarship Fund will also be established by Hebrew U to help international students studying in its public health and community medicine program.

Graduates of the program go on to become "leaders and educators in their home countries on areas such as HIV, malaria and tuberculosis prevention and control, prevention and treatment of heart disease, malnutrition, and mother and child health," according to CFHU.

One such graduate, Dr. Josephine Oji ambo, is now Kenya's ambassador to the United Nations. She will also be honoured at the event. Other honourees for the evening include Saltzman; Fiona Eberts, international philanthropist and widow of Jake Eberts; Amir Amedi, a Hebrew U brain scientist working on restoring sight to the blind via technology, and Menahem Ben-Sasson, Hebrew U's president. Emceeing the evening will be Jian Ghomeshi, host of CBC's Q talk-radio program, musician and writer.

For more information about the event, visit www.cfhu.org or call 416-485-8000, ext. 112.

Toronto, Israel hospitals start exchange program

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital is the latest Canadian institution to forge ties with Israel in the form of a new exchange program for medical professionals specializing in intensive care medicine.

The Zvi Eizenman Canada-Israel Exchange Program between Meir Medical Center and Mount Sinai began last weekend with the arrival of Dr. Mirit Lahav, a graduate of Tel Aviv University's Sackler School of Medicine and an anesthesiologist at Israel's Meir Medical Center.

Meir hospital is affiliated with the Sackler School.

During her one-month stay in Toronto, Lahav will join the daily intensive care unit (ICU) rounds at Mount Sinai and will attend the department's business meetings, safety and quality meetings, and research meetings, according to Moshe Eizenman, a researcher and scientist with the University Health Network, and one of the sponsors of the exchange program named in honour of his late father, who passed away in Meir's ICU.

Lahav could not be reached for comment in time for deadline.

The heads of the Meir hospital ICU department decided earlier this year that an exchange program with a major Canadian institution was a "high priority," Eizenman said.

Researcher and scientist Moshe Eizenman is one of the sponsors of the Zvi Eizenman Canada-Israel Exchange Program, named in honour of his late father.

"The aim of this program is to provide specialists in the ICU of the Meir Medical Center opportunities to interact with foreign specialists and different cultures while being exposed to different patient loads and treatment approaches," he said in a statement. "In addition to clinical exposure, the exchange program will provide opportunities for joint research projects, ICU education and simulation-teaching, and quality assurance."

Brian Fredman, chair of the department of anesthesiology, critical care and pain management at Meir hospital, said he is excited by this joint initiative.

"There is no doubt that education is the cornerstone to successful patient management," he said. "Training medical staff is a long process that requires not only time and dedication but also opportunities to see and be part of different systems and cutting-edge ideas. The exchange program provides just that."

When approached about the exchange, Mount Sinai's chief clinical officer, Dr. Toim Stewart, said he thought it was a "fantastic idea."

"We would welcome the exchange and hopefully will reciprocate in the future," Stewart added.

Lahav will also participate in simulation training sessions and spend time with Mount Sinai's critical care response team.

Meir Medical Center is one of Israel's most rapidly expanding care facilities, and is currently working on construction of a new 25,000-square-foot orthopedic pavilion.

The centre is currently roughly the size of Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre campus.

To build the new pavilion, Meir needs to raise $60 million over the next three years.

The teaching hospital, located in Kfar Saba, just north of Tel Aviv, serves nearly one million people, Arabs and Jews, each year.

Meir is known for its advances in the fields of cancer research, diabetes, geriatric care, pediatric care, head and neck surgery and orthopedic surgery.

It currently has ongoing projects with the Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Western Ontario.

Canadians are also some of the most passionate supporters and strongest donors to Meir hospital, with some $2 million raised for the centre through its Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Centre charity since 2010.

The charity will hold its annual Medal of Merit awards ceremony on April 28 at the Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St., with proceeds going to support the hospital many endeavours.

Rabbi, shul reach settlement after dismissal

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Martin Berman and Shaar Shalom Synagogue have reached a settlement of the wrongful dismissal lawsuit he launched against the Thornhill congregation in January.

Neither the rabbi nor the congregation would discuss details of the settlement.

Rabbi Berman, 63, has led the congregation since 1994. He was informed in October that the shul's board of governors and executive had decided not to renew his contract. He will remain spiritual leader of the congregation until his contract expires July 17.

Rabbi Berman had alleged wrongful dismissal and violation of his rights under the Ontario Human Rights Code.

The rabbi told The CJN that the terms of the settlement, which was finalized outside of court last month, prevent him from discussing it, but that he would continue working full time and will be on vacation as of mid-May.

However, he will be at the shul for "a couple of celebrations" that take place on Shabbat, he added.

Shaar Shalom president Janice Shachter said the settlement was a "fair" one in terms of Ontario labour law and precedents, and that it was "roughly within" the shul's original offer.

"We're at a healing place" now, she said. "We're all very pleased that it came to such a fast conclusion."

The shul is in the process of looking for a new rabbi. "We have some good candidates that we are conducting second interviews with," Shachter said.

Koffler Centre moving downtown

Hewer said the new downtown space, along with the centre's administrative offices at the Prosserman JCC, will give the Koffler "a presence all across the GTA."

The centre also runs arts classes out of the new Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Vaughan, Ont.

Proceeds from the Koffler Rocks! Event will go toward the move to the new space downtown.

Earlier this month, the Koffler Centre received a $150,000 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation "for all the building renovations and fit-up for our new Koffler Gallery and office spaces at Artscape Youngplace," Hewer said.

In an email, Bachman told The CJN he was excited to participate in the gala and help further the cause of the Jewish, arts-based non-profit.

"I had done several charity shows in Montreal a few years ago just before Chanukah to raise money for Jewish hospitals and extended old-folks care. The people were amazing, the charity event was a huge success, and I was warmly embraced both personally and professionally. It rocked!" he wrote.

Asked what tunes the audience could expect him to play, Bachman said he planned to "celebrate the modern rock Jewish writers who have inspired me – Bob Dylan, Neil Diamond, Paul Simon, Leiber and Stoller, etc."

As a Mormon growing up in Winnipeg, Bachman said he was raised alongside Jews who positively influenced his life.

"I grew up in Winnipeg in a Jewish community. I went to the YMHA and loved it because all my friends went swimming there, and they had great dances, which I eventually performed at. The family strength and unity, respect for the elders and parents seemed very similar to me," he said.

Together with performances of live music, the Koffler Rocks! evening also includes a cocktail reception showcasing artists' works from Koffler education programs and a gourmet kosher dining experience. The event is hosted by the award-winning and bestselling author of Born to Kvetch, Michael Wex.

Shuls celebrate special anniversaries

Frances Kraft

Beth Torah turns 50, Lodzer marks 60 years

Two Toronto congregations are celebrating anniversaries on April 28.

Beth Torah Congregation is throwing a 1960s Mad Men-themed gala with gambling, cocktails and live music at the Park Hyatt hotel for its 50th on Sunday night.

The same evening, the Lodzer Synagogue will host a black tie-optional dinner for its 60th anniversary, with Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, as MC, and featuring the Juno-nominated group Jaffa Road.

Beth Torah, an unaffiliated Conservative congregation near Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue West, was established in 1963 and broke ground in 1964.

Despite its location and longtime low profile, Beth Torah began to thrive under the leadership of Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, who became its youngest rabbi in August 1998. Four years ago, the shul completed an $8-million renovation and expansion.

The rabbi, who turns 45 the day of the gala, said that being "off the beaten track [geographically] is probably a metaphor for what I think shuls need to start considering – that maybe the mainstream is also the place most people leave from.

"Don't be afraid to try something new," he said.

Probably the biggest challenge for the synagogue arose when it was struggling in the early 1990s, Rabbi Sapirman said. "If not for the generosity of a few, the shul would have gone under."

Among recent innovations at the shul, small children are on the bimah during the Torah service, the rabbi and cantor greet every attendee during the Torah procession, and there is a sit-down lunch every Shabbat.

Founding member Mark Goldenberg said his biggest pleasure 50 years later is to see his children and grandchildren enjoying services at the shul.

Goldenberg credits Rabbi Sapirman for his efforts, particularly in making young children part of the service. "We weren't on the map as a shul [before]… Nobody knew Beth Torah."

Beth Torah's earliest services were held in the basement of a private home, and then in an unheated portable purchased from the Catholic Diocese of Mississauga, according to anniversary committee chair Ellen Scheinberg.

Goldenberg remembers that the 10 founding couples – young newlyweds who lived in the area – each signed a guarantee for $1,000 to the bank, "which we needed for a down payment for the land."

Rabbi Benjamin Hauer, an Orthodox rabbi, was the shul's first spiritual leader, before he moved to Montreal.

Scheinberg said the shul, which has more than 500 member families and almost 200 students at its Hebrew school, is now "very vibrant. It's growing."

The Lodzer traces its history to 1953, when it was founded as a mutual benefit society for families from Lodz, Poland. It became a synagogue only in 1981.

Rabbi Moshe Meirovich, who serves as the shul's rabbi and cantor, said the 200-family congregation, which is unaffiliated Conservative and now egalitarian, was "built on tremendous hope."

It has grown "from a place of social interaction to a place of Jewish worship, study and adult education," he said.

In recent years, more young families have joined, and a separate family service is held on the High Holidays, as well as a monthly family service. Also, on Shabbat, the rabbi is joined on the bimah by young children "to help conduct the Musaf service," he said.

The Lodzer's treasurer Morry Nosak said the congregation was like an extended family for him when he was growing up in the 1960s. As a child of survivors, he had no grandparents, aunts or uncles. His late father, Rafuel Nosak, was a shul founder who served as longtime gabbai.

Nosak describes the shul as "heimish and family-oriented… Even today that kind of feeling is still there."

The founders – landsmen from Lodz – supported each other financially, emotionally and spiritually, said Nosak, who is co-chairing the gala with his wife, Melanie Steiner.

As well, he added, even though the founders had their own financial needs, the focus of the society became supporting the State of Israel and raising funds for Israeli causes like Magen David Adom.

Now, Nosak said, the second generation "is trying to maintain the heritage from the past, and, at the same time, go forward."

Other recent changes include the rabbi "teaching and engaging the congregation" most Shabbat mornings, in lieu of a formal sermon. As a result, this year the shul instituted a study session after services, over kiddush lunch.

Other anniversary-related events include a Torah dedication by the family of founding members Izak and Regina Kozlowski the day of the gala, and a May 21 concert that will be part of Jewish music week.

A special monthly message for the Baycrest community

CommunityMatters

Valuing our strong community relationships

By Garry Foster, Chair, Baycrest Board of Directors & Dr. William E. Reichman, Baycrest President and Chief Executive Officer

One of the more gratifying aspects of leading Baycrest Health Sciences is having the opportunity to meet so many members of our community on a regular basis. We are highly fortunate to be able to build ongoing relationships with clients and their families, as well as with our community at large—a dynamic group that comprises donors, students, healthcare professionals, volunteers of all ages, artists, researchers, business people and members of local Jewish congregations.

These relationships are highly valued by Baycrest, perhaps more so than by other healthcare organizations. You see, Baycrest is much more than just a bricks-and-mortar building. It's a jewel that exists because of the vision of its founders, generations of forward-looking community builders who recognized the need for a place to care for the most vulnerable older adults. And their continued involvement over the decades has helped transform Baycrest into a global leader in aging and brain health research and innovations.

We recognize the pride our community feels in this organization, and the strong connection it feels to our past and to our future. And as we continue on our journey, we are committed to ensuring ongoing opportunities for dialogue. Only by listening and responding to advice and the collective wisdom of our community can we hope to achieve greatness; we understand this, and we are actively providing the means for this sharing to take place.

OUR JEWISH COMMUNITY

Baycrest was founded by a group of women with the foresight to establish the Jewish Old Folks Home in 1918, an endeavor that has evolved into the world-class facility we know today. For nearly a century since, Baycrest has embraced its Jewish roots and traditions, and continues to meet the religious and cultural needs of residents—90 per cent of whom are Jewish—with weekly services, holiday celebrations and a unique Holocaust resource program. Staying well connected to our Jewish community is a priority, and a number of initiatives and events enable us to maintain strong relationships.

Next month, for example, Baycrest is marking Jewish Heritage Month with a number of special public art installations that reflect upon our history and our Jewish legacy as seen through the eyes of artists and our own residents.

Baycrest Foundation President Susan Sutton shares a conversation with Evelyn Burns-Weinrib, a long-time volunteer and donor.

Rabbi Dr. Geoffrey Haber, who joined us last year, has been meeting with leaders in our Jewish community, and has begun publishing a Rabbinic Reflections blog to share information with a broader online audience. Rabbi Geoff is helping to lead a number of outreach activities, including speakers' series events and a visiting cantor's program.

Members of our community were recently invited to attend our Yom Hashoah service to remember the six million who perished in the Holocaust. And on April 23, we will be joining Holocaust survivors and their families, as well as staff and volunteers, at the National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony at the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa.

STRATEGIC PLAN

Our recently approved Strategic Plan, designed to guide Baycrest into our second century, was developed and refined after a thorough consultation process that involved nearly 700 members of our staff and our community. It was important that a strategy of this significance reflected the input of our internal and external stakeholders, ensuring we are working together on common goals and aspirations. Achieving the ambitious objectives in our plan requires a partnership with our community, one that will also require significant philanthropic support over the coming years. We know we can only be successful if our Strategic Plan resonates with our supporters, and if it aligns with their vision for our future. The plan we developed with our community's input is available on our website at www.baycrest.org/strategicplan.

OPINION PANELS

Strong relationships are built upon effective communications. And understanding the communication needs of our community—and, in turn, meeting those needs—is something Baycrest takes very seriously. Earlier this month, we launched an Opinion Panel to gather feedback from our clients, families and community members on a quarterly basis. These short surveys are designed to help measure our external reputation and the quality and effectiveness of our communications with you. By knowing your thoughts and perceptions, we can work to better meet your needs and forge even stronger communications in the future. The opinion panel can be accessed on our website at www.baycrest.org/opinion.

MEDIA UPDATES

The very column you are reading is another example of how we are reaching out to our community to share information on a regular basis. With a large readership in our Jewish community, Canadian Jewish News is an ideal forum for keeping you informed about happenings at Baycrest. But we're happy to note that Baycrest is in the media all the time. Our experts are routinely called upon for comment in the areas of aging and brain health, and our research, innovations and superior level of care attract considerable interest from reporters—locally, nationally and internationally.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Engagement is about more than just one-way communication. It's about sharing. And one of the best ways of sharing ideas, comments, photos, video and online links is through social media. Facebook, Twitter, YouTube and LinkedIn have allowed us to engage with audiences on a new level, and to provide another opportunity for our community to communicate directly with us—and with each other—in a way that is simple, accessible and transparent. All of our social media sites may be accessed from the home page of our website.

We also encourage you to contact us directly with questions or comments by emailing us at community@baycrest.org.

Through ongoing dialogue with you, our community, we are able to ensure Baycrest remains a jewel of which we can all be proud. On behalf of Baycrest, thank you for your continued support.

ICRF honours women of action

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The 12th annual Women of Action luncheon raised more than $400,000 for the Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF).

Some 400 guests attended the luncheon at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel in Toronto on April 9 to pay tribute to four women who have made a difference though their achievements in business and medicine and their contribution to the community.

Lynda Reeves, founder and publisher of the Canadian House & Home magazine, received the inaugural Carole Tanenbaum Women of Action Business Award for her contribution to the business community.

For the past six years, Reeves, together with her team, have designed and decorated the grand-prize show house for the fall lottery in support of the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation, helping to raise more than $40 million for the cause.

Tanenbaum, the creator of the Carole Tanenbaum Vintage Collection and a longtime supporter of the ICRF, said that as a past Woman of Action business honoree "it is gratifying to continue to award outstanding women in business for their accomplishments and success," adding that she hopes the award will inspire "all women to pursue their goals and follow their dreams."

Honoree Jill Reitman, a community leader, received the Vicki Campbell "VAST" Community Award. The VAST award was established in 2012 to honour the late Campbell, who devoted much of her life to enhancing the lives of people in Toronto, Israel, and around the world. Campbell was an ICRF Women of Action honoree in 2009.

Reitman thanked the ICRF for giving her the "opportunity to serve as a role model for others and to inspire the next generation to action. I thank them for the opportunity to pay tribute to an inspiring and wonderful friend of mine – Vicki Campbell."

Honoree Emmanuelle Gattuso is a breast cancer survivor who became an advocate for breast cancer patients. Along with her husband, Allan Slaight, Gattuso has raised $25 million to establish the Gattuso Rapid Diagnostic Centre at the Princess Margaret Centre, which is a model for other cancer centres in Canada and beyond.

Honoree Dr. Meredith Irwin is a clinician-scientist who has discovered several novel functions of genes that belong to the "p53" family. Her studies are aimed at unravelling the mystery of how genes are involved in pathways that lead to the development of cancer, and how they determine the sensitivity of cancer cells to therapies.

"We are delighted to celebrate four deserving women as this year's Women of Action for their contribution to our community," said ICRF president Bryna Goldberg. "We are honoured that they have chosen to help ICRF in our important mission of raising funds to support cancer scientists working in universities and cancer labs throughout Israel."

Since its inception in 2002, Women of Action has funded 40 Israeli scientists and raised more than $3 million for ICRF.

Luncheon guest Elaine Todres, a cancer survivor, said that if we haven't been touched by cancer directly, then we have been touched through our families. She added that it's "extremely important for there to be a wide societal understanding of the need for research and changes in clinical care and that's why I am here."

The Women of Action presenting sponsor was RBC, and the event co-chairs were Debra Campbell and Wendy Kady.

An eyewitness look at a fascinating age

One of the great discoveries of the last century and a half occurred in 1887 at the Egyptian site of Tell el Amarna, which bore the ancient name of Akhetaton. It was the newly built capital city of the heretic pharaoh, Akhenaten, or Amenhotep IV, whose reign was known as the Amarna Age. It was also a revolutionary period, especially in religion and art, a time when Akhenaten briefly attempted to introduce a quasi-monotheistic faith to Egypt.

Fortunately for historians and archeologists, the new capital did not survive the reign of Akhenaten. As a result, the correspondence of the heretic pharaoh was buried in his abandoned capital, giving future generations an eyewitness account into this fascinating age.

It was in 1887 that tablets from Amarna started appearing in the antiquities market. Four years later, the great English Egyptologist, Matthew William Flinders Petrie excavated the site and discovered the archive as well as a large number of documents.

What was most significant about these tablets was the insight they provided into an amazing period of history. They were dated to the mid 14th century BCE, a period that the renowned American Egyptologist James Henry Breasted, founder of the University of Chicago's famed Oriental Institute, called the first international age. The tablets were written using the cuneiform script, primarily in the Akkadian language of Mesoptamia, the diplomatic lingua franca of the day.

Most of the well-known Near Eastern civilizations are mentioned in the tablets, including the Babylonians and the Hittites, (who were the subject of my last column). A number of rulers of petty kingdoms in Canaan are mentioned as well, such as those of the city states of Shechem, Jerusalem and Byblos, in what is now Lebanon.

Past Forward

But it was the mention of a group called the Habiru that caught the attention of biblical scholars. The word sounded tantalizingly like "Hebrew" and started a debate that is still going on today.

These Habiru are portrayed as landless wanderers who are fugitives living outside of the settled communities in Canaan. The term first appears in the early second millennium BCE. Characteristically, the Habiru have many of the same qualities as the Hebrews, but the consensus is that the terms were not synonymous.

What adds to the fascination of both the Amarna letters and the mention of the Habiru in the texts is that these events occur roughly on the eve of the Exodus. They give us a first-hand account of the Land of Israel just before the arrival of the Israelites. It shows us a land where the grip of Pharaoh's rule is weakening and the rulers are divided. This is a situation that is begging to be exploited, which is exactly what Israel would do upon its arrival there.

Yet, there are scholars who doubt that arrival. Regardless of scholarly consensus, however, it is an occasion that we have celebrated for many generations. For those who have faith and believe, it is an event whose existence is without doubt.

You and your Jewish name, Pt. 1

Abraham, Itzik, Yarkon.

Sarah, Becky, Revital, Leora.

Your Jewish name says a great deal about you. It hints at when and where you were born, how traditional your parents were when they chose your name, your family's roots – and according to Jewish tradition, it reveals aspects of your personality.

"The name of a person describes his or her essence," explains Cantor Mark Kirshblum. "Just as God empowered Adam when He assigned him the first independent human act, the task of naming the beasts of the field, the birds of the sky and every living thing... A name can be a portent for the future or a wish that the person live up to the potential expressed in the meaning of the name. It is important, therefore, to give much thought to a child's shem kodesh, sacred or Hebrew name." [http://bit.ly/jname1]

The connection between a name and one's soul has deep kabbalistic roots. Rabbi Paysach Krohn points out that the Hebrew word for "soul" – neshamah – is spelled with the letters nun, shin, mem and hei. The Hebrew word for "name," shem – spelled shin, mem – is contained within the word neshamah, indicating the strong connection between one's name and one's soul, or essence. [http://bit.ly/jname8]

Jewish tradition has always placed a higher value on someone's first name than on the family name. Only the first name and father's name are used when being called up to the Torah. Similarly, it is a person's first name and nicknames that are crucial to the validity of the divorce document, the get. [http://bit.ly/jname2]

A given name can yield vital clues when researching your family tree. For example, if you are trying to guess what Great-Aunt Fannie's Jewish name was in Europe, the Given Names Data Base database

Jewish & Digital

suggests it might have been:

Franya, Frumka, Vromot (in Poland);

Feyge, Foygl, Froma (in Hungary);

Fanni, Freydele, Fanya (in Galicia). [http://bit.ly/jname4]

And if you have a question about the origin of a Sephardi name, you can join the Sefard Forum Email Discussion List. [http://bit.ly/jname11]

Your Jewish name is yours for life, and tradition rarely allows it to be changed. One exception is in the case of serious illness. Rabbi Simkha Weintraub quotes the Talmud that says that one of the things that "may cause an evil decree passed on a person to be cancelled [is a] change of name." A man who is ill may be given an additional name such as Raphael (God heals) while a woman may be named Brachah (blessing.) [http://bit.ly/jname6]

Finally, a story via Rabbi Berel Wein about a brit milah that a friend of his attended. When the rabbi asked the father what he was going to name the newborn boy, the father responded:

"Avraham, Yitzchok, Yakov, David, Shlomo, Yosef."

The rabbi was astounded. "Why such a string of names?"

"Rabbi, I am a poor man so the child won't have much of an inheritance... If he resembles my wife's side of the family, he probably won't be that smart. And if he looks like my side of the family, he is not going to be too handsome, either. So, I decided, let him at least have a good name!" [http://bit.ly/jname7]

Next time, help finding that perfect name.

What character trait are you working on?

Rabbi Michael Skobac

As a young American Jew, Sara Riger didn't find that Judaism resonated with her spiritual aspirations. Like many others, she travelled to India and was drawn to Hinduism. After returning home and completing university, she spent the next 15 years living at an ashram teaching Vedanta philosophy and meditation.

That wasn't the final stop on her spiritual journey. Today, she lives in Jerusalem and is a best-selling author and teacher of Jewish spirituality. In a recent interview, Rigler was asked what was lacking in the Judaism of her youth. She said that Judaism was presented to her as a culture, heritage and identity, but not as a path to personal growth.

When we observe a child develop during the first decade of their life, we're witness to incredible changes and maturation. There's virtually nothing that a newborn has in common with an adolescent. The same seismic changes occur over the next 10 years as well from little kid to young adult almost ready for marriage. But what real growth takes place between 20 and 30 and in succeeding decades? There may be more grey hair and a larger waistline, but is there real personal development?

Sadly, Rigler never saw in Judaism any guidance on how to become someone with more patience and inner peace. She never understood how the Judaism she was raised in helped nurture a kinder and more generous nature. She didn't see a technology for personal transformation. She was fortunate at least to have discovered this core part of Judaism later in life.

The midrash actually teaches

Rabbinic Reflections

that the Torah and its practices were given for no other reason than to refine our characters (Leviticus Rabbah 13:3). Along these lines, the Gaon of Vilna wrote, "For a person is alive only in order to break a [negative] character trait that he has not broken until now. Therefore, one should always strengthen one's self, for if he does not strengthen himself, why is he alive?"

The Torah commands us to count the 49 days between the start of Passover and Shavuot, when the Almighty revealed the Torah to us at Mount Sinai (Leviticus 23:15-21). Our sages teach that these are special days of both anticipation and preparation. We "count down" in excitement toward the great day and make each day count by working on perfecting our character traits and actualizing our potential. It's a widespread custom to study one chapter each week from Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) that focuses on personal growth.

The Torah directs us to follow the ways of God (Deuteronomy 28:9). Kabbalistic literature refers to 10 sefirot, ways in which God relates to the world. Some people have the practice of working each week on another one of these attributes with a regimen of study, meditation and exercises. For example, during the first of the seven weeks, people may focus on various aspects of the trait of chesed (kindness). The idea of dedicating a period of time to working on our character traits is also a central aspect of Mussar practice that has become increasing popular in recent years.

Rabbi Michael Skobac is director of education and counselling at Jews for Judaism.

Holiness is right next door

Within our upcoming Torah portions is a sentence that has generated a tremendous amount of interpretation. Leviticus 19:18 states that every person should "love your neighbour as yourself." It seems like a simple statement, and yet there is so much subjectivity involved that one could argue it is meaningless.

For instance, do I love in any measurable form? What is an expression of love for me may not be an expression of love for anyone else. Also, who constitutes my neighbour? Is it someone who lives in my community? Is it my fellow Jew? Is it gender specific? All of these questions arise without even beginning to address how I love myself and whether I can extend that love to anyone else?

As with any other commandment in the Torah, there are varying opinions among commentators and much debate around this verse. It appears within the "Holiness Code," the portion of the Torah that describes how we can elevate ourselves toward holiness. Certainly we would want to pinpoint all the details that could help us elevate ourselves.

One of the approaches to this verse is expressed by the sage Rabbi Akiva, who taught us that the Torah equates your life with the life of your neighbor, but it doesn't prioritize your neighbour's life over your own. In other words, your love for your neighbour should not exceed your personal commitment to yourself. There is no model for martyrdom, but rather a model of self-appreciation that extends toward those around us.

Midrashic Moments

Within the Talmud, Rashi presents an interesting interpretation of identifying who would qualify as "your neighbour". According to Rashi, this neighbour is none other than God. This interpretation is additive to the literal. In other words, the Torah verse not only refers to our human neighbours, but also to our Divine Neighbour. The example given is that just as we would not want God to ignore our requests and demands, so we should not ignore God's requests and demands.

This interpretation certainly raises the bar of achieving holiness. It's difficult enough to treat everyone around us with the respect and honour we give ourselves, but to now extend that to God creates a layer of spiritual complexity that's challenging at best. It means I must keep God in my thoughts at all times. It means I must respect everything in this world as belonging to God the way I would want my belongings to be respected by others. It means everyone I meet is to be treated honourably as I would want anyone meeting my children to treat them. It puts God at the core of everything and all my relationships.

Rashi has taken the concept of holiness and introduced into it the aspect of God. Now, part of holiness involves my ability to view God as both a transcendent unknowing Being as well as my closest neighbour.

Anti-Israel boycott draws little interest

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

An attempted boycott of a Halifax health food store that carries Israeli SodaStream products has mostly fizzled, according to Mark David, the Atlantic region consultant for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

Only about a dozen middle-aged protesters appeared at Planet Organic April 7 to urge a boycott of SodaStream products. They were shooed away from the store by management, and their efforts appear to have had no impact on sales, he said.

Instead, David and CIJA's "Buycott Israel" initiative is urging consumers to purchase SodaStream products and inform store management of their shopping decision, he added.

SodaStream is an Israeli company that sells soda-making gas cylinders that allow consumers to make their own carbonated beverages. One of the firm's principal Israeli production facilities is in Mishor Adumim, which protesters say is on occupied Palestinian land.

Marta Mikita-Wilson, president and CEO of SodaStream's Canadian operation, said the company has been the subject of boycott attempts at times over the past few years, but very little has come of it.

Sales have not been adversely affected, and the publicity has led some consumers, who were unaware of the company, to take a closer look at its products, she said.

"It's almost a reverse effect," she added. "You put us in the light of the media and people say what's this?"

They find out that "it's a huge wellness product" that's good for the environment, reduces pollution created by plastic bottles and is beneficial to consumers.

"People sell more after they create awareness," she added.

Mikita-Wilson, who hails from Poland, said protesters' concerns are unfounded. "When we built the factory, there was as of yet no agreement there would be a Palestinian state there," she said. "It's close to the border and... it's not sure how it's been established about what territory belongs to who."

She said in postwar Europe, the borders of Poland, Germany and Czechoslovakia all moved, but "nobody boycotted over borders."

Mikita-Wilson said the company employs hundreds of Palestinians, about half its workforce.

"SodaStream has been targeted around the world. Somebody feels that we as a company don't recognize Palestinian workmanship. That's not true. We create the work for them. We give them a chance to make a decent living."

She pointed to a promotional video released by the company – "Building Bridges, not Walls" – which touts its positive impact on Palestinians. It provides them with jobs, respects their religious practices, brings them into the same workplace with Druze and Israelis, including those of Russian and Ethiopian backgrounds, pays them far more than the prevailing wage in the West Bank, and does so at the cost of profits.

Company CEO Daniel Birnbaum said in the video that the location of the factory would make more economic sense if it were closer to suppliers, technicians and the country's port.

David said advocates of the BDS movement have in the past attempted to boycott Halifax's Mountain Equipment Co-op store, which also carried Israeli products, but "we don't usually see this kind of boycott here."

David added that he purchased SodaStream merchandise at Planet Organic and "we made sure that Planet Organic was thanked for carrying Israeli products."

At The CJN's press time, Planet Organic had not responded to a request for an interview.

Music legend Randy Bachman set for KOFFLER ROCKS!

Founder of the Guess Who and BTO to Headline Fundraiser

The Koffler Centre of the Arts, Canada's only contemporary, multidisciplinary, cutting-edge Jewish cultural institution, is going rock 'n' roll for its annual fundraising gala this year.

KOFFLER ROCKS! on May 2, 2013 at the Artscape Wychwood Barns will be a glorious gala evening of pop, rock, jazz, and R&B with a Jewish spin, hosted by the award-winning and bestselling author of Born to Kvetch, Michael Wex.

The evening will feature an elegant dinner reception showcasing artists' works from Koffler education programs and performances of live music from Canadian music superstars. Guests will also have the opportunity to bid on a Randy Bachman-autographed electric guitar.

Music legend Randy Bachman – founder and former band member of the Guess Who and Bachman Turner Overdrive, and now the host of the wildly popular CBC Radio program Vinyl Tap – will headline the live performance, celebrating the modern rock Jewish writers who have inspired him, from Bob Dylan to Neil Diamond, Paul Simon to Leiber + Stoller. Joining Bachman on stage will be Canadian indie and alt-country stars The Sadies, and two-time Grammy Award-winning and 2013 Juno Award-nominated R&B singer/songwriter Melanie Fiona. Together for the first time for one night only, the musicians will perform their own original songs and others from a uniquely Jewish perspective.

Randy Bachman

Proceeds from KOFFLER ROCKS! will benefit the many exhibitions, programs and educational activities of the Koffler Centre of the Arts. A registered not-for-profit and agency of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Koffler relies on the Gala each year to provide a significant portion of its operating funds.

This year is especially important for the Koffler, as its 4-year nomadic program of 'Off-Site' gallery exhibitions will come to an end. In fall 2013, the Koffler will open a new 4,600 square foot Koffler Gallery and office space at Artscape Youngplace – in the historic and newly renovated Beaux-Arts building on Shaw Street just north of Queen St. West – in the heart of Toronto's art and design district. The new downtown space will give the Koffler a presence across the GTA, with a downtown Koffler Gallery, classes and programs at the Prosserman JCC at Bathurst and Sheppard, and visual arts classes for families at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Vaughan. The centre will also continue to program events – such as the annual Toronto Jewish Literary Festival and Koffler Chamber Orchestra concerts – at other locations across the city.

To support the Koffler, purchase tickets for KOFFLER ROCKS! and for more information, go to www.kofflerarts.org or call 416-638-1881 x4022. General admission tickets start at $100.

UJA Federation's Shabbat Itanu promotes an inclusive community

By Daniel Koren

Itanu Toronto – UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's inclusion initiative – was born from the belief that a community should always welcome and include people with special needs. For several years, Itanu Toronto has organized a yearly, community-wide event known as Shabbat Itanu to draw attention to this issue. This year, 26 synagogues across the Greater Toronto Area are participating to help in shaping an inclusive Jewish community, the highest number the event has seen thus far.

"Through Shabbat Itanu, we encourage synagogues to focus on, and reach out to, people with special needs in our community," says Chair of this year's program, Daniel Schild. "Our idea is to attract as many congregations as possible to spread this message."

This year's Itanu Committee, which is comprised entirely of volunteers, has worked diligently to raise awareness throughout the community.

"Regardless of your beliefs or affiliations, everyone benefits from an inclusive community," Schild adds. "People with mobility issues, seniors in particular, need help attending synagogue. Most of them want to continue to live a Jewish life, and just because it's harder for them to, doesn't mean they shouldn't be able to."

This year's Shabbat Itanu will take place on Friday April 19th to Saturday, April 20th. The event hopes to attract larger audiences to a regular Shabbat service, providing rabbis and shul leaders the chance to create specific programming that highlights the importance of inclusion in our community.

Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) will feature a sermon directed by Rabbi Lavi Greenspan, a blind young rabbi who will share his moving journey with the congregation. "When BAYT decided to participate in Shabbat Itanu, we realized we had very capable partner agencies, such as Dani, Our Way, Reena and Yachad, which provide services to special needs members," says BAYT's Rabbi Daniel Korobkin. "What will result, we hope, will be a Shabbat where we all pray, sing and study together."

Shaarei Shomayim has partnered with Camp Aim, a therapeutic camp for children of all abilities, for their Shabbat Itanu program, and will feature guest speaker Ellen Schwartz, author, parent of a child with special needs, and co-director of Jacob's Ladder. "This is Shaarei Shomayim's third year participating in Shabbat Itanu," proclaims Rabbi Chaim Strauchler. "It's something our children look forward to. They love sharing Shabbat with the camp kids, and it's been a beautiful partnership with our synagogue."

Participating synagogues for this year's Shabbat Itanu include: Annex Shul, the BAYT, Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Beth Haminyan, Beth Sholom, Beth Tikvah, Beth Tzedec, City Shul, Darchei Noam, First Narayever Synagogue, Holy Blossom, Lodzer Centre Congregation, Makom Creative Downtown Judaism, Neshama, Or Hadash, Pride of Israel, Shaarei Beth El, Shaarei Shomayim, Temmy Latner Forest Hill Jewish Centre, Temple Emanuel, Temple Har Zion, Temple Kol Ami, Temple Sinai, Temple Shalom and The Village Shul.

Montreal Orthodox shul hires first female clergy

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A woman will soon join the clergy of the Orthodox-practising Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, which has become the first synagogue to announce that it's hiring a graduate from the inaugural class of a new yeshiva that ordains women.

Rachel Kohl Finegold, 32, who presently serves a Chicago synagogue, will become director of education and spiritual enrichment at the synagogue effective Aug. 1. Among her duties will be speaking "periodically" from the pulpit, leading Torah text classes and visiting the sick and elderly, as well as developing programs for youth and young families.

Rachel Kohl Finegold

Finegold is one of three women slated to graduate in June from Yeshivat Maharat in the Bronx, N.Y., which was founded in 2009 as the first institution to train Orthodox women as spiritual leaders and halachic authorities. Its founder, Rabbi Avi Weiss, is a leading figure in modern Orthdoxy and is also the founder and president of the modern Orthodox Yeshivat Chovevei Torah Rabbinical School.

"Rachel's appointment breaks exciting new ground for our congregation," Shaar Hashomayim's Rabbi Adam Scheier and president Joseph Paperman said in a newsletter to congregants. "It is consistent with the evolution of modern Orthodoxy."

Yeshivat Maharat's four-year program includes Torah and Talmud study, halachic decision-making, pastoral counseling, and training as poskot (legal arbiters) for the community.

Maharat, which is the title Finegold will use, is a Hebrew acronym for "manhigah hilchatit ruchanit Toranit," which means a teacher or leader of Jewish law and spirituality. Although the honorific "Rabba" has been proposed for the graduates, she will not be known that way.

Finegold is coming to Montreal with her husband, Rabbi Avi Finegold, who is from Montreal, and their two young daughters (a third child is expected any day). She will work closely with Rabbi Scheier, whose wife, Abby Brown Scheier, is one of the other two soon-to-be Maharat graduates.

Finegold's position has been newly created for her. She will be part of a clerical team that also includes Cantor Gideon Zelermyer and ritual director Rabbi David Wolfson.

The position of associate rabbi, which was held by Rabbi Yonah Berman, until his departure last summer, won't be filled at this time, Rabbi Scheier said.

For the past six years, Finegold has been education and ritual director of the Orthodox Anshe Sholom B'nai Israel Congregation in Chicago, where she holds the Dr. Carol Fuchs Kaufman Rabbanit Chair.

In a telephone interview, Finegold downplayed any portrayal of her as a trailblazer.

"Nothing I'm doing is new [for Orthodox women], nothing is against Jewish law, yet the trappings are different, it looks different," she said.

The role of Orthodox women has been slowly progressing since they were given the opportunity of serious Torah study in the 1970s, she said.

The Yeshivat Maharat program has afforded them the possibility of "taking the next logical step" – being leaders in a synagogue – she said.

Finegold said the precise details of her participation in regular services at Shaar Hashomayim have yet to be ironed out, but in Chicago, she delivers the Shabbat sermon about once a month.

She will not sit on the bimah, but rather in one of the front rows, as she does in Chicago.

"In Chicago, there was hesitation at first [about her appointment] – this is the Midwest, it's very traditional. There were people who were nervous because it did not feel familiar, but I was really surprised how welcome I've felt… I've been told it's refreshing to hear a woman's voice."

With ordination, Finegold said she expects the major difference in what she will be doing will be having the ability provide more answers to questions about Jewish law. Women especially will appreciate this, if they are uncomfortable asking a man, she added

Outreach to potential new members will be an important part of Finegold's work at the Westmount congregation, which, with more than 1,400 families, is the largest in Montreal and the city's oldest Ashkenazi congregation.

Before entering Yeshivat Maharat, Finegold, a New York native, received a BA in religion from Boston University and completed the Drisha Institute Scholars Program in New York, an intensive graduate-level program in Judaic studies.

Finegold completed her internship at Ohev Shalom – the National Synagogue in Washington, D.C.

At the Chicago shul, she created weekly Shabbat tfillah groups for every age group and others activities that have attracted young families in particular.

She was recently recognized as one of the Chicago Jewish community's outstanding "36 Under 36" young leaders by the Jewish United Fund.

She is a member of the editorial board of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance Journal.

Although not officially an affiliate of the Orthodox movement, Shaar Hashomayim, which years ago was part of the Conservative United Synagogue, does follow modern Orthodoxy. The shul is fully supportive of the movement to expand women's leadership in Orthodox congregations, Rabbi Scheier said.

The congregation was looking to hire a woman to fill the vacancy in its clergy, and it invited Finegold to apply, on Rabbi Scheier's suggestion. The board agreed with him that she is an "extraordinary" person who has "swept us off our feet."

"This has been part of an ongoing conversation at the Shaar: how to maximize the role of women within the bounds of Halachah. This is a major step… The Shaar is not officially affiliated with any movement, but it does follow Orthodox law, practice and teaching," Rabbi Scheier said.

Finegold, Rabbi Scheier pointed out, is "deeply Orthodox," but he said the role of female members won't necessarily change with the addition of a female cleric.

Women can now speak from the pulpit and carry the Torah before the general congregation, and, at women's services, read from the Torah, he said. They can also lead certain prayers, such as those for the State of Israel and the government of Canada, and deliver benedictions at Shabbat morning services, he added.

Zionism and moderate Quebec nationalism

Richard Levy
Guest Voice

English-speaking Jews in Quebec have a unique vantage point to positively view the moderate versions of two kinds of nationalism: Quebec nationalism and Jewish nationalism (Zionism).

As part of the minority language community, we bear the brunt of protective language laws, the most visible offshoot of Quebec nationalism. As proud Zionists, we resent the sustained criticism of the Jewish state within the United Nations and by "progressives" who denounce the Law of Return and other "deviations" from an illusory ideal democracy.

But how is that we wince at the claims by even moderate Quebec nationalists (not secessionists) that their culture requires special protection but passionately champion Jewish nationalism and its immigration preferences and associated special measures?

Israel right to be wary of Arab peace initiative

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

We're likely to hear quite a lot in the coming months about the Arab peace initiative (API), which U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry reportedly aims to employ as a way to advance a Palestinian-Israeli peace agreement.

Adopted by the 22-member Arab League in Beirut in March 2002 as an amended version of a more flexible Saudi plan, the API – on the surface – offers Israel "normal relations in the context of a comprehensive peace" (as the official text states).

Many western analysts have viewed this plan as a major breakthrough in Arab-Israeli relations and a peace plan that Israel should welcome, if not embrace. However, it's the details of the API that really matter. The API requires "full Israeli withdrawal from all the territories occupied since 1967, including the Syrian Golan Heights, to the June 4, 1967 lines." It likewise calls for "a just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem to be agreed upon in accordance with UN General Assembly Resolution 194." These two conditions are non-starters for Israel.

First, the API claims to adhere to UNSC Resolution 242, which calls only for Israeli withdrawal "from territories" not from "the territories" or "all the territories" acquired in 1967. But the API contradicts 242's implicit recognition that the 1967 lines (more accurately, the temporary 1949 armistice lines) would be modified through negotiations to achieve "secure" borders, in contrast to the weak defences afforded by the 1949 armistice.

Second, Arab parties (incorrectly) interpret UN General Assembly Resolution 194 as providing Palestinian refugees with a "right of return" to their former homes in present-day Israel. Given that this would spell the end of Israel as a Jewish state, such a position mocks the claim that the API embodies a "comprehensive peace."

Kerry reportedly hopes to get the Arab League's API committee to agree to changes on the first subject (the border issue). Nothing has been indicated about his views on the second subject (Palestinian refugees). In any event, the API was offered to Israel as a "take-it-or-leave-it" deal, as reconfirmed by the Arab summit in Riyadh in 2007, when efforts to make the initiative more acceptable to Israel were soundly defeated.

John Kerry and Benjamin Netanyahu

Some analysts have said that, in at least one respect, the API does allow for flexibility. In his April 10 Globe and Mail story about the API, Patrick Martin pointed out that the initiative "left the details open to negotiations" on the refugee issue. On this point, he's technically correct, since the relevant passage in the API speaks about "an agreed upon" solution.

Nonetheless, the API immediately adds that this is to be agreed upon "in accordance with" UNGA 194, which, as mentioned above, is interpreted by virtually all Arab parties in a way completely inimical to Israel's very existence. (The reference to 194 was added by Lebanon and Syria to the initial Saudi plan specifically to toughen it up, and make it palatable to those states that have traditionally been most hostile to peace with Israel.)

Today, with total rejectionist forces such as Hezbollah largely in control of Lebanon's government, Hamas ruling in Gaza, the Muslim Brotherhood in charge in Egypt, and Syria in the grip of a devastating civil war, with Islamist forces in the ascendancy, those dedicated to Israel's destruction are as influential as ever. In this atmosphere, the API, already encumbered by terms and conditions hostile to the Jewish state, becomes even harder to sell as a plan for "comprehensive peace" based on "normal relations" with Israel.

The surface language of the API serves today to put Israel, which has always sought genuine peace with its neighbours, on the defensive. Israel, for the above reasons, has solid grounds for deep concern about an initiative that appears to a great many outsiders as a perfectly reasonable opportunity to bring the Arab-Israeli conflict to an end.

The task for Israel is to pursue what is possible for peace, but also to explain to the world what's really at stake with the API.

Anti-bullying bill divides Winnipeg rabbis

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A new government anti-bullying bill is dividing Orthodox rabbis in Winnipeg over its requirement that publicly funded schools must accommodate students who want to form "gay-straight alliance" clubs at their schools.

Bill 18, introduced last December, is committed to supporting student initiatives in schools that promote inclusivity and talks about providing "safe and caring learning environments for students where all students feel respected and can reach their full potential."

The part of the bill that is causing controversy is the clause requiring all public schools and any private schools that get public funding to form a "gay-straight alliance" club if a student wants one.

The bill has been strongly criticized in other Manitoba faith communities, and a similar one that passed last year in Ontario sparked controversy among Catholic Church leaders and some Orthodox rabbis.

Winnipeg's two leading Orthodox rabbis have jumped into the fray, but on opposite sides.

Rabbi Avrohom Altein

Rabbi Avrohom Altein, Winnipeg's longtime Chabad Lubavitch rabbi, was the first to make his views known in a letter he wrote to Manitoba Premier Greg Selinger in mid-March.

In an interview with The CJN, Rabbi Altein said he applauds the government's efforts to protect people who are being bullied, but the clause encouraging gay-straight alliances in schools must be modified.

"Many religious people do not accept homosexuality," he said. "The Torah rejects homosexuality. You wouldn't tolerate someone going into an Orthodox shul and demanding treif food. Similarly, religious schools should not be forced to accept a gay rights group."

Rabbi Altein said he believes that everyone deserves respect and that he's not calling for anyone to be persecuted for who they are or what they believe.

"As Jews, we have to be particularly sensitive to persecution," he said. "But forcing religious institutions to accept homosexuality has nothing to do with teaching respect for individuals and combating bullying."

Rabbi Ari Ellis, spiritual leader of the Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun congregation, Winnipeg's largest Orthodox congregation, said he didn't intend to get involved in the debate over Bill 18, since it has little relevance to the Jewish community as a whole.

"I felt that I had to respond, though, when I read Rabbi Altein's letter and heard his comments on CBC," Rabbi Ellis said. "I understand what he said and why he said it, but it bothered me that he presented his point of view in the name of Orthodox Judaism rather than as a personal view. It's not a black-and-white issue."

Rabbi Ellis referred to the 2010 document Statement of Principles on the Place of Jews with a Homosexual Orientation in Our Community, signed by more than 200 leading Orthodox rabbis, educators, and community leaders, which affirmed that "it is critical to emphasize that Jewish law only prohibits homosexual acts; it does not prohibit orientation or feelings of same-sex attraction and nothing in the Bible devalues the human beings who struggle with them. Heterosexual marriage is the ideal model and sole legitimate outlet for human sexual expression."

Rabbi Ellis agreed with Rabbi Altein that, as a matter of faith, Orthodox Jews believe in the divinity of the Bible – both of the written and the oral law.

"Jewish law cannot change to reflect each and every latest fad or trend. I do not believe, however, that having a gay-straight alliance is similar to having a group for Jewish students who wish to promote the eating of pork," he added.

"At our synagogue, we don't judge individuals or ask someone whether they observe Shabbat or kashrut before welcoming them into our congregation. Everyone is welcome to attend and be a part of our community. But welcoming someone into our community doesn't mean that we endorse all their personal choices."

He added: "As an Orthodox rabbi and a Jewish educator, it is my belief that a gay-straight alliance could be a welcome institution in our schools and communities. In fact, I would want to encourage Jewish teenagers with a homosexual orientation to seek guidance from their rabbis and teachers in dealing with their struggles within a Jewish framework, instead of turning elsewhere for help."

Rory Paul, head of school and CEO at Gray Academy of Jewish Education, Winnipeg's only kindergarten to Grade 12 Jewish private school, said his institution has had a gay-straight alliance group for a couple of years.

"We are a community school. We are open to all students who wish to attend," he said.

"From our perspective, from a bullying point of view, we have been working for years to ensure that our school is a safe and secure place for students," he added "We deal with all negative situations as they arise."

Rabbi Ellis said the response to his comments on this issue from his congregation and the larger Jewish community has been mainly positive. "I've received only two negative responses," he said.

Bone marrow drives

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Thousands of people have registered for the national bone marrow registry since Warren and Kelly Roll of Montreal put out the call that their four-year-old daughter Jayden was in need of a match.

They hope more will join the registry at their upcoming bone marrow drives in Toronto on April 21.

"You're told your kid has cancer and it's been the most devastating feeling you can possibly imagine," Warren Roll said. "Most of us are ambitious people. We like to take control of things, and when it comes to cancer, there's not much we can do."

However, while the family waits to hear whether Jayden has a match in the international bone marrow registry, they and their friends have organized bone marrow drives in Canada and the United States.

Their Montreal drive at Concordia University was a huge success, registering an unprecedented total of about 2,700 people, Roll said.

They're hoping the Jewish community in Toronto will be just as supportive, especially since patients are most likely to find a match within their own ethnic background – in this case, Ashkenazi Jewish.

The Toronto drives will take place at Bialik Hebrew Day School and Aish Thornhill Community Shul on April 21 from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Winnipeg Reform shul marks 50 years

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On April 20, Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation, will host a special evening in celebration of its 50th anniversary.

"We will be having a concert and a dessert buffet," said Miral Gabor, Temple Shalom's current president. "We're hoping to have about 100 people."

It hasn't been easy for Temple Shalom over the years. Winnipeg's Jewish community has always been quite conservative. It's not that it was a stronghold of Orthodoxy – it had a strong socialist, Yiddishist strand for the first half of the 20th century. Nonetheless, Jewish Winnipeggers brought up in Orthodox or Conservative families, have tended to remain loyal to the synagogues their families first belonged to.

These days, that would be the Shaarey Zedek Congregation, this community's largest synagogue, or Congregation Etz Chayim in northern Winnipeg, which used to be the Rosh Pina before merging 11 years ago with two other large north Winnipeg congregations.

Gabor said Temple Shalom currently has about 110 member families, a figure that has remained relatively constant over the years. On an average Friday evening Oneg Shabbat, it attracts 40 people, though many more attend Cantor Len Udow's special music services, held every two months, more than 200 people attend High Holiday services.

Temple Shalom was founded in 1963 by three couples and two individuals. Initially, the small shul met in members' homes. In 1970, the growing group relocated to a building in the old North End that housed the National Council of Jewish Women's Golden Age club. At around the same time, the congregation hired its first spiritual leader. For Rabbi Jerry Steinberg, it was also his first pulpit. Rabbi Steinberg, who grew up in Regina and went to university in Winnipeg, wrote about his tenure at Temple Shalom in his recently published memoir, Rogue Rabbi. The congregation and the rabbi agreed to a parting of the ways after a few years.

After a time, Temple Shalom hired Rabbi Eric Silver. He was succeeded in 1986 by Rabbi Tracy Klirs, the first woman to serve as a rabbi in Winnipeg. By that time, the congregation has acquired a renovated house in south central Winnipeg.

Rabbi Klirs only stayed for a couple of years. She was succeeded by Rabbi Jeffrey Gale, whose 10-year tenure was the longest of Temple Shalom's spiritual leaders. The congregation moved into its current building in south Winnipeg in 1989, coincident with Rabbi Gale's arrival. Rabbi Michael Levenson, spiritual leader from 1999 to 2003, generated controversy in the larger community when he publicly announced that he'd perform mixed marriages and gay marriages.

After his departure, the temple relied on visiting student rabbis until Rabbi Karen Soria moved to Winnipeg in 2008 and became the current spiritual leader.

The congregation has long been blessed with popular cantors. Richard Yaffe, a lawyer by profession, served as its cantor and choir director for more than 20 years. When he left in 1998, he was succeeded by Udow, a longtime children's entertainer and folk singer who released an album of cantorial music last year.

Gabor and her sister, Sima Schachter, joined Temple Shalom when they were in their early 20s. They persuaded their parents, Phil and Lee Schachter, to join as well, and Phil Schachter has twice served as president.

Conference to address importance of spiritual care

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Spiritual care is a vital component of the medical team caring for patients with protracted illnesses such as Alzheimer's disease, says the director of the Jewish Theological Seminary Center for Pastoral Education.

"The way families grapple with the illness is framed in how they understand the meaning of it," said Rabbi Mychal Springer, in a telephone interview from New York.

Rabbi Springer, 47, a certified Jewish chaplain, will explore Jewish spiritual approaches for families living with protracted illnesses including those whose loved ones are afflicted with Alzheimer's and dementia, at a program titled "The Long Goodbye: Living with Protracted Illness," April 21, 7 p.m. at the Lipa Green Centre.

The program, open to the community at no charge, is presented by the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Rabbi Mychal Springer

On April 22, Rabbi Springer will speak at a breakfast for health-care professionals at Baycrest Health Sciences, and at a lunch program at Beth Sholom Synagogue for rabbis and non-Jewish clergy.

All programs are sponsored by Baycrest, the Benjamin Foundation, Beth Sholom, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Hereld Fund at the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Rabbi Springer said that when she was on the verge of becoming ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary in the early 1990s, she did not know how Judaism could help people.

"I knew a lot of text and tradition, but not how to help. I then did some clinical work at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, and it was there that I came to see how religious resources can make a huge difference [in the lives of patients and their families.] I was [inspired] to change the direction of my work."

As part of her work now, she said, she trains clergy of all faiths in how to care for people in crisis. "At a certain point in their illnesses, patients often search for ways to understand their lives.

"[With the proper guidance] they can come to celebrate the gift of life, and understand how their life can best be lived. This can apply to families as well."

Spiritual care does not begin with what people know, she said, but rather with an internal dialogue. "The desire to connect to something larger may happen, but the approach is individualized."

In a hospice situation, Rabbi Springer said, we meet people "in the fullness of who they are. [The patients] are not seen as symptoms, but as people who need to reflect on their lives. Spiritual care plays a key role in helping people to find closure and peace."

It is a privilege for her to work with people at this point in their lives, she said. "It is inspiring to be part of the rawness of people's lives. It becomes clear to me and to the patient, what life is all about."

Flower campaign to aid abused women in shelters

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than 400 women and their children in the Greater Toronto Area will be in a shelter for abused women on Mother's Day this year.

With their urgent need for housing, clothing, food, safety and employment, Mother's Day will just be another day for them to survive. The Act To End Violence Against Women Mother's Day flower campaign will remember these women with sincerity and dignity.

The campaign is a two-part process: for each minimum donation of $25, people can send cards to honour their mother, grandmother, mother-in-law, sister, aunt or friend, and Act To End Violence Against Women will pay these donations forward by sending bouquets of flowers to women in shelters across the GTA on Mother's Day.

This gesture will put a smile on the faces of many of the women. In addition, the funds raised will go to support Act To End Violence Against Women programs that empower women of all ages and help break the cycle of violence.

Violence against women is an ongoing global issue. In Canada, more than 50 per cent of women have survived at least one incident of physical or sexual violence. Act To End Violence Against Women, a registered, non-profit charitable organization envisions a world where women and children can live free from violence, abuse or oppression.

Some of the programs of Act To End Violence Against Women include a legal information service to help women navigate the legal system, shelters for abused women and their children, children's libraries installed in shelters across Canada, Sexual Violence Awareness Week on Canadian campuses, and community education and advocacy.

Capriles calls for recount after losing Venezuelan presidency

JTA

CARACAS — Venezuelan Opposition leader Henrique Capriles, the grandson of Holocaust survivors, is calling for a recount after narrowly losing the country's presidential election.

Nicolas Maduro, the acting president and preferred successor of the late president Hugo Chavez, was declared the winner of Sunday's election with 50.7 per cent of the vote. Capriles won 49.1 per cent, a difference of 235,000 ballots.

In calling for the recount, Capriles cited voting irregularities. He has not accepted Maduro's declaration of victory, Reuters reported.

Chavez died of cancer on March 5. Maduro will serve out the remainder of his six-year term.

In national elections last October, Capriles won 44 per cent of the vote in losing to Chavez by 11 percentage points.

During the 2012 presidential campaign, state-run media urged Venezuelans to reject "international Zionism" and vote against Capriles, describing him as having "a platform opposed to our national and independent interests."

Chavez also said the Mossad, Israel's secret service, was out to kill him, and he accused Israel of financing Venezuela's Opposition. Government media described Capriles as "Jewish-Zionist bourgeoisie."

Baird defends meeting in east Jerusalem

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Palestinian Authority summoned Canada's envoy in Ramallah for reprimand over the weekend in response to Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird's decision to meet Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni at her office in east Jerusalem.

The Palestinians objected to Canada breaking a longstanding tradition of diplomats not meeting Israeli officials in the eastern part of the city, which the Palestinians claim as their capital, saying it legitimizes Israel's unrecognized claims to sovereignty there.

Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat also sent a strongly worded letter to Baird last Friday in which he said the meeting amounted to Canada's "diplomatic recognition of the situation created by the attempted annexation of our capital is a flagrant violation of international law."

Baird's meeting with Livni came during a visit to Israel from April 6 to 9 to reaffirm the friendship between the two nations. It was part of a broader Middle East trip that included Jordan, Qatar, Lebanon, and the West Bank.

Baird also visited the Golan Heights while in the region.

The subject of his meeting with Livni was raised earlier last week when Baird, speaking to reporters in a conference call April 11 while attending G8 meetings in London, was asked why he broke what Palestinian officials called "the taboo" on foreign diplomats visiting east Jerusalem.

Baird shrugged off the question, responding that all his meetings with Israeli and PA representatives aimed to help further the peace process.

"I'm just not interested in getting into these semantic arguments about whether you have a meeting with one person on one side of the street it's OK, if you have a meeting on the other side of the street it's not," he said.

"We're focused on trying to tackle the difficult serious challenges: that's the security for Israelis in any end to the conflict and the legitimate aspirations for a state from those... in the Palestinian side. And where I had coffee with Tzipi Livni is I think irrelevant to that and it doesn't signal a change in Canadian foreign policy."

Overall, the foreign affairs department called the minister's visit to Israel "warm and constructive."

In Baird's meetings with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres, talks revolved around how Canada could support Israeli security concerns in the region as well as how both countries could expand existing economic and cultural ties.

John Baird and Shimon Peres

In a statement, Baird's office said his April 9 meeting with Netanyahu touched on many issues, including Iran's continuing nuclear program and its sponsorship of international terrorism, the crisis in Syria, renewed peace talks with the Palestinians and "the value of a constructive Turkey-Israel relationship."

Netanyahu also asked Baird to consider how Canada might take more of a role in "revitalizing" peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

The two politicians also spoke about continued co-operation on energy issues. Israel and Canada jointly announced the creation of the Canada-Israel Energy Science and Technology Fund last October in light of the Jewish state's newfound massive offshore natural gas and oil reserves.

The fund is supposed to "spur the development of innovative energy technologies and processes that enable the responsible development of unconventional oil and gas resources, including commercial applications that address shared environmental challenges," Baird's office said.

It's also designed to strengthen co-operation in areas of renewable energy and energy efficiency and prompt investment from both countries.

According to the ministry, the fund is expected to "generate $20 to $40 million in collaborative research and development [projects] over the next three years. Two successful Canadian research and development workshops took place [last month] and brought together leading Canadian and Israeli stakeholders to identify potential partnering opportunities. The first call for proposals is expected later [this month]."

Canada and Israel are also planning to establish what is being called a "Strategic Partnership Agreement," described by the ministry as "a work plan which will provide both countries concrete benchmarks to further deepen the bilateral relationship."

Speaking to Israeli media on April 8, Baird said Canada supports Israel's right to defend itself from its enemies.

Referring to Iran specifically in an interview with Israel's Channel 10 news, he said if Israel decides to strike unilaterally at Iran, the Iranians will only have themselves to blame, while stressing that Canada does not support unilateral Israeli military action to thwart Tehran's rogue nuclear program.

"Iran is clearly doing all it can to waste time" in negotiations, Baird said.

"Iran is not going to get rewarded for just showing up at the negotiating table," he added. "Iran represents the biggest threat to international peace and security in the world today, and the world should respond with that in mind."

In welcoming Baird to Israel, Peres said his country considers Canada and its current government to be "among our closest friends and I want to thank you for an outstanding friendship which is based not only on interests but on profound values. We appreciate the ongoing support of the Canadian government, and the prime minster. On all occasions, in all domains and with every opportunity your government took a clear and courageous position including a very clear position vis-à-vis the greatest danger of our time, Iran."

Peres also praised the Canadian Jewish community, characterizing it as "exceedingly warm" toward Israel.

Baird also met with Palestinian leadership to determine the future of Canada's humanitarian aid to the Palestinian Authority.

Canada's five-year, $300-million aid package to the PA expired as of April 1. Administration of the funding transferred to the department of foreign affairs from the Canadian International Development Agency in late March.

Kerry's bid to revive peace talks rejected

Joshua Davidovich and Gavriel Fiske
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Despite what U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry termed as "constructive talks" in his bid to revive negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians last week, indications from both sides pointed to an unwillingness to go along with the U.S. initiative.

Senior officials quoted in Israeli media on April 10 said Israel had taken issue with a number of parts of Kerry's plan, including pre-negotiations on goodwill gestures and the shape the talks would take.

The reports came hours after Palestinians said they would only come to the table in exchange for "a clear formula" concerning final borders and the release of detainees in Israeli jails, underscoring the fragility of U.S. efforts to jump-start peace talks after a 2-1/2 year hiatus.

Kerry left the region on April 11, after several days of talks with Israeli and Palestinian leaders. Press reports indicated that he had offered the Palestinians a package of Israeli good-faith concessions in exchange for a return to the negotiation table.

Speaking to reporters before flying to London, Kerry stressed that he was being mindful of the "good intentions and failed efforts" that have dogged Middle East diplomacy in the past and said he would focus on "laying the groundwork so we can bring people to the table with a clear understanding of what we're beginning on, what we're trying to do, and where we're trying to end up."

But a senior Israeli official told news website Ynet that Jerusalem had no intention of providing the Palestinians with any concessions ahead of talks, which had reportedly been a keystone of Kerry's efforts.

Kerry is expected to spend the next several months engaging in a type of shuttle diplomacy to push the sides closer together. Talks between the sides have been frozen since 2010, at the tail end of a 10-month moratorium on Israeli settlement construction.

The Palestinians say they want another freeze before coming to the table while Israel has called for talks without preconditions.

U.S. President Barack Obama, during his visit in March, endorsed Israel's position in favour of new talks without preconditions. Still, Abbas is understood to be demanding assurances that Israel is prepared in principle to relinquish 100 per cent of the West Bank, with various one-for-one land swaps to enable Israel to keep key settlement blocs.

Rabbi Gilles Bernheim

French chief rabbi resigns

JTA

PARIS — France's chief rabbi, Gilles Bernheim, beset by a plagiarism scandal, has resigned.

Rabbi Bernheim, 60, announced his decision April 11 during an emergency meeting with the Consistoire, the Jewish religious services body that employs him.

Until a new election is organized, the chief rabbi of Paris, Michel Guggenheim, and the director of France's rabbinical school, Rabbi Olivier Kaufmann, will fill the vacancy.

Rabbi Bernheim, who has served as chief rabbi of France since 2008, has been plagued over the past few weeks by a scandal in which it was revealed he committed several instances of plagiarism in two of his books and in an essay against gay marriage published last year.

He was also accused of not correcting his official biographies, which say he holds a degree in philosophy that he never actually earned.

After initially denying one accusation, Rabbi Bernheim acknowledged his "serious mistakes" on April 9 in an interview with the Paris-based Radio Shalom.

Rabbi Bernheim had said he would not resign, arguing that a resignation would be a "desertion" and an "act of pride."

PA prime minister resigns

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas accepted the resignation of Prime Minister Salam Fayyad after an internal power struggle. Abbas asked Fayyad to stay on to lead a caretaker government until a new government is formed, the WAFA Palestinian News service reported. New elections have not yet been scheduled, as the two major parties, Hamas and Fatah, work toward reconciliation. In the past few weeks, already tense relations between Fayyad and Abbas reportedly deteriorated due to major disagreements over government policy in the Palestinian Authority and rumours that Abbas would fire Fayyad, who also serves as finance minister. Fayyad, who was educated in the United States, had the backing of U.S. President Barack Obama and other western leaders, who believed him to be essential to building an independent Palestinian state.

Erdogan postpones Gaza visit

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan said he would delay a planned trip to the Gaza Strip until after he meets with U.S. President Barack Obama at the White House in Washington on May 16. According to the Turkish daily Hurriyet, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry advised the Turkish prime minister to reconsider the timing of his planned visit to Gaza. Erdogan announced his intention to visit the Hamas-ruled Gaza Strip following Israel's apology to Turkey last month over the May 2010 deaths of nine Turkish militants who attacked Israeli soldiers aboard the Mavi Marmara. Lawsuits against Israeli soldiers involved in the incident will continue in Turkey despite the apology by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Israel launches new TV network

A new Israeli television channel that will broadcast news 24 hours a day in English, French and Arabic is set to launch this summer. The channel plans to compete with established global news outlets such as Al Jazeera, according to Carlos Gurovich, head of production for i24news in France. The i24news channel, based in Jaffa Port near Tel Aviv, "will broadcast news from the heart of Middle East," the channel said in a statement. Gurovich said the channel would be funded privately, unlike other projects such as the Alef Network in South America or the J channel in France, which depend on the support of their Jewish communities. "This gives the channel the independence to work without depending on community money or donor funds," he told JTA.

The top 65 ways Israel is saving our planet

Nicky Blackburn
Israel21c.org

When 22-year-old Emmanuel Buso was pulled barely alive from the rubble of a three-storey building 10 days after an earthquake devastated the island of Haiti, the first faces he saw were those of the Israeli rescue workers who had flown across the world to save lives.

For Haji Edum, from Zanzibar, his life-saving moment came twice, when he was flown at age 15, and then again at 23, to Israel for open-heart surgery. He is just one of thousands of youngsters to receive emergency heart care from volunteer doctors in Israel.

War veterans suffering post-traumatic stress in the United States; farmers in Senegal, India and China; young women in South Sudan; the wheelchair-bound in Africa; cardiac patients in Gaza and Iraq – all have received life-changing help and expertise from Israeli specialists.

Today, we all know the story of Israel the startup nation. News of its technological prowess and incredible innovation has spread far and wide. But what many people don't know is that Israel is exporting far more than just technology. It is also sharing its experience and skills in a whole range of humanitarian and environmental fields to help people everywhere live better, fuller and healthier lives.

Since Israel was founded in 1948, the country has set itself the goal of becoming a light unto the nations. In the early years of the state, despite austerity rationing, the Israeli government founded Mashav, the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Center for International Cooperation, as a vehicle to share Israel's creative solutions with the rest of the developing world.

Israel remains true to that vision, and every year, with little fanfare, and sometimes very little press attention, Israelis work long hours to find solutions and offer relief to some of the most pressing problems of our times.

From environmental breakthroughs that will help reduce greenhouse emissions and technologies that can increase food production and save vital crops to humanitarian aid missions in the wake of catastrophic natural disasters, Israelis are providing significant assistance.

To celebrate Israel's 65th birthday, Israel21c takes a look at some of the many creative and varied ways Israel is helping to enrich and improve our planet.

The list comes in no particular order, and is by no means exhaustive. There are hundreds, if not thousands, more worthy projects going on every day.

Yes. You can hike in a wheelchair

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c.org

Thirty years ago, Israeli hiker Amos Ziv saw a group of visually impaired teens on a nature trail. They were having a rough time of it, and Ziv decided the only solution was for him to find a way for people with disabilities to experience the outdoors safely and enjoyably.

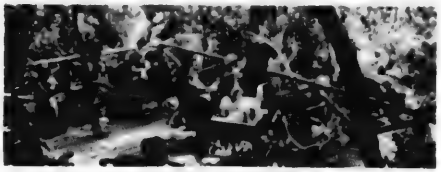
That's the story behind LOTEM, a non-profit organization that serves about 30,000 Israelis every year through a range of nature clubs and outdoor programs geared to children and adults with physical, communication and intellectual disorders, and hearing and vision impairment. It also serves at-risk populations, including women and children living in temporary shelters in refuge from domestic abuse.

The organization runs a one-of-a-kind ecological farm in Emek HaShalom (Valley of Peace) near the northern city of Yokneam, where people with disabilities participate in seasonal activities such as pressing grapes and olives, as well as drawing well water and baking pita.

Together with Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael-Jewish National Fund (KKL-JNF), LOTEM built Israel's only fully accessible circular hiking trail, situated in the picturesque Galilee region of Nahal HaShofet, in 2002.

LOTEM also works with special-needs groups from abroad such as Yachad, the National Jewish Council for Disabilities, an American organization that leads its own Birthright trip to Israel.

"We're the experts in the field of accessible hikes, so it's really something we'll be working to expand," said JNF-LOTEM liaison Alisa Bodner. She also arranges free "inclusive Israel" day trips for visiting individuals or families – able-bodied or not – to learn about LOTEM and experience a different side of Israel.



Together with Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael-Jewish National Fund, the non-profit LOTEM built Israel's only fully accessible hiking trail.

"When we make our tours accessible, it's not only physical accessibility but also pedagogic accessibility," Bodner told Israel21c. "We provide each group with guides who can give specialized instruction to fit their particular special needs and level of understanding."

Hallel Ben-David, a 12-year-old girl who visited the Emek HaShalom farm with her family, blogged afterward that LOTEM guide Paula Friedland told them about a local boy who often hiked through Nahal HaShofet.

"He would hike on a trail that led to a particular cave there, until he was in a car accident and became paralyzed. When LOTEM was planning to construct the accessible trail, they... asked what they can do to bring back his experience of hiking. He told them that they should build the trail in a way so that he can return to the cave. This is what they did," Hallel wrote.

Bodner said about 12 per cent of the Israeli population has some form of disability, whether as a result of a medical condition, accident or violence. LOTEM co-founder Sorin Hershko ended up a paraplegic due to injuries he received in his military unit's daring rescue of Israeli hostages from Entebbe, Uganda, in 1976.

An acronym for the Hebrew phrase "integrated nature studies," LOTEM works with the Israeli ministries of education, agriculture, health and welfare, the National Insurance Institute, and also with private foundations and donors in Israel and abroad. For the past seven years, LOTEM has been a JNF partner organization.

In addition to accessible hikes and agricultural activities at Emek HaShalom, LOTEM runs "Integra-Teva," which uses nature and outdoor activities to foster coexistence among Jewish and Arab youth with special needs.

Two LOTEM programs focus on facilitating friendships between children from special-needs and mainstream classrooms. The group also has nature clubs for children, adults and senior citizens confined to residential facilities and rehab centres.

'Grandma Esther' helps the poor in Kiryat Gat

Anna Harwood
Special To The CJN

Israel was engulfed in fighting on its southern border, on Nov. 14, 2012. Operation Pillar of Defence was launched by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) in response to the barrage of rockets emanating from the Gaza Strip.

Israel looked on as the IDF began its widespread campaign, targeting military structures and operatives throughout Gaza. In response, Hamas shot more than 1,400 rockets into Israel, reaching as far as Tel Aviv and the outskirts of Jerusalem.

The south of Israel was under attack. The sirens wailed day and night and the south shut down. Residents of cities such as Ashkelon, Kiryat Gat, Kiryat Melachi and Be'er Sheva fled to their shelters. Sderot residents on Gaza's border had long become familiar with the "red alert" warning them of imminent attack, but for those cities located up to 30 miles from Gaza, the operation came as a shock.

Factories closed, transport ceased and citizens took cover. Six Israelis were killed, 269 Israelis were injured and houses, cars and businesses were damaged. For the south, which contains some of the most economically disadvantaged areas in Israel, the operation was yet another blow to their fragile economy.

But as the shelters once again gather dust, the south of Israel is still struggling to pick its feet up economically after years of poverty, distress and neglect.

According to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics, in 2001, 31 per cent of the south was classified as "poor." The research used a new indicator to measure poverty and defined a person as poor when their "physical existence and needs distract [them] every minute of the day and therefore most of [their] economic resources are allocated to food consumption and residence."

Just 15 miles from the Gaza Strip lies Kiryat Gat. During Operation Pillar of Defence, rockets sent residents running for shelter, and this already poverty-stricken city was plunged further into darkness. "The economic situation in Kiryat Gat is unstable. The operation made it worse. People didn't leave their houses," said Maya Naim, whose house in Kiryat Gat was hit by one of the rockets coming from Gaza. "My business suffered, my house was damaged and my disabled son's car was destroyed." Naim has received compensation for the damage to her house, but the car was not included in this. She is now spending hundreds of shekels each month on taxis to enable her son to get to work.

Kiryat Gat's residents struggle to provide for their families' basic needs, with the average wage being around 50 per cent lower than the national average. Though the situation is dramatic and unemployment rates run high, there are organizations and people making a real difference in this troubled community.

Esther Richtman is one such shining beacon. She was recently honoured with the Citizen of the City award at a ceremony in the city centre.

Richtman arrived in Kiryat Gat in 1964 from Romania with her husband, Abraham, and their first child on the way. Following a long career in the textile industry, the couple decided to spend their retirement giving back to the people of Kiryat Gat. Richtman, who is known as "Savta Esther" (Grandma Esther), has now become somewhat of a local celebrity, thanks to her work with Meir Panim.

Esther Richtman, top, who's known as Savta (Grandma) Esther, runs the Meir Panim after-school club in Kiryat Gat. Here she is with Chagit Hazan and her two children.

The leading Israeli relief organization Meir Panim operates two Power of Giving warehouses in southern Israel to distribute furniture, clothes and household necessities to those who cannot afford to purchase them at regular prices. At first, Richtman volunteered at the Kiryat Gat warehouse sorting items and mending donated clothes.

"I saw the good that Meir Panim was doing by supporting the poor, but more importantly, how they did it with dignity" [customers pay a nominal fee for each item so that they don't feel they're receiving a handout]," Richtman said.

Eight years ago, when working in the warehouse, she overheard that Meir Panim was looking for someone to run their after-school facility for some of the poorest children in Kiryat Gat and she jumped at the chance to help.

"Within a week, Meir Panim had located premises for me, provided me with National Service volunteers and we had decorated the club to feel like a home," Richtman said. "We are dealing with children whose parents cannot afford to feed them healthy meals each day, who are left to their own devices and who simply continue their parents' cycle of poverty."

Together with Meir Panim, Richtman is working to break this cycle of poverty. The children turn up at school prepared because she delivers school supplies at the beginning of the school year. The children are able to study because they receive two hot meals a day, and studying at school is complemented with homework help from the National Service volunteers.

"I'm so grateful that Savta Esther came into our lives eight years ago," said Chagit Hazan, the mother of two participants in the after-school club. "I work long hours in an old-age home and try to support my children on my own, but without Savta Esther and Meir Panim I don't know what we'd do." Hazan added that there are parents and children queuing up to be admitted to the after-school club.

Kiryat Gat is just one example of a city trying to get back on its feet now that peace has returned to the area, but it is not easy. "When the rockets stopped falling, southern Israel slipped off the media radar," said Goldie Sternbuch, assistant director of overseas relations at Meir Panim. "But for those of us who witness this poverty daily, it is clear that help is needed now, as much as ever before."

Meir Panim is currently building a nutrition centre in Kiryat Gat, which will not only produce the thousands of hot meals that Meir Panim needs to feed Israel's poor each day but also provide a much-needed boost to Kiryat Gat's dwindling economy.

Getting the south back on its feet after years of trauma caused by rocket fire and economic distress is no easy feat, but slowly but surely the future looks more positive. "This [past] Pesach we will be yet again distributing food cards to enable residents stock their cupboards with the special foods needed at this time of year," Sternbuch said. "We will be hosting hundreds of adults and children for communal seders and hoping to bring a little joy to those in the midst of economic distress."

As in previous years, Richtman also has a few tricks up her sleeves for the children of Kiryat Gat, and she looked forward to truly celebrating Pesach both with the children and also with their extended families.

Isrotel to open two new hotels in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In 1981, British immigrant David Lewis built a luxury hotel in Eilat that catapulted the sleepy Red Sea port town into the major leagues of international tourism.

The King Solomon Palace attracted thousands of British and French sun-seekers, and laid the groundwork for construction of even more hotels by Lewis's Isrotel chain.

Eilat remains the site of seven of Isrotel's 17 hotels, but the country's second-largest chain has plans to open more. Nahum Kara, the company's director of marketing and sales, described the company's expansion plans last week at a meeting in Toronto. Speaking to members of the travel industry gathered under the auspices of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO), Kara said the company has set June 2 and June 7 as the "soft openings" of the Royal Beach Hotel in Tel Aviv and the Cramim Spa Hotel in the Jerusalem Hills, respectively.

Nahum Kara

The company has plans to add yet a third new hotel in two or three years. Land has been acquired in the Gan Hapamon neighbourhood in Jerusalem near the old train station and within walking distance of the Old City, Kara told The CJN. The proposed five-star hotel will offer 250 rooms to go along with 30 condominium residences.

The new venues add to a roster of largely upscale units recently added by Isrotel. Perhaps the most unusual of the new inns is the Beresheet, a boutique hotel situated on the rim of the Ramon Crater in Israel's Negev Desert.

The deluxe facility opened two years ago and has attracted visitors from around the world.

"Missions have put this hotel on their itinerary because it is unique," Kara said, adding that so far, 30 per cent of the facility's visitors hail from North America. In addition to offering a spectacular view of a unique geological formation, the hotel provides jeep tours, camel rides, hiking, bicycle trips and other outdoor adventure activities.

Kara said Isrotel plans to expand, testifying to the health of the tourism business in the country. "Tourism is a growth area in Israel," he said.

Though its latest ventures are in the luxury category, the company continues to operate three- and four-star hotels as well. And it is regionally diverse. In addition to its stronghold in Eilat, it runs several hotels along the Dead Sea. This region of Israel, only about an hour or two drive from Jerusalem, caters to those seeking the therapeutic benefits of the region, including mud baths and healing waters.

"The Dead Sea is considered a spa region and east Europeans and Russians respect the natural spa facilities," Kara said.

Isrotel has managed to compete with international chains because of the vision first laid out by Lewis more than 30 years ago, Kara said. "There is no future without a past, and the company was established by a Zionist Jew from the UK... He was a dreamer. He was a pioneer in developing tourism to Eilat, and today Eilat is a resort destination for [people from] around the world.

"We want to be the best in all categories. First, it starts with the condition of our buildings. We constantly renew our properties." In addition, the chain focuses on quality of service, delivered promptly, and on its food and beverage service. Kara said.

The results can be found in the financial statement's top and bottom lines. In 2012, Isrotel generated 987 million shekels ($275 million) in revenue, and reported a net profit of 73.5 million shekels ($21 million).

Continuing a policy established by Lewis, who died in 2011, the company reinvests all its profits into the venture, Kara said.

The Lewis family retains control over 87 per cent of the company; the remaining shares are traded in the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange.

There is more to the company than business, Kara said. "We are continuing the policy of the founder. He used to be a great Zionist. Today we employ more than 4,000 employees and bring tourism to the country. We are proud of what we are doing."

Joining Kara in addressing the travel industry mavens was Dinah Kutner, general manager of El Al Airlines in Canada. Kutner said the carrier has added an Economy Plus category to its flights out of Pearson. Something between business class and economy, the Plus offers more leg room, the use of an iPad, 30 per cent more recline for the chairs and small "amenity kits." Cost for the Plus section is the normal economy fare, plus $150.

IGTO director Ami Alon said some 70,000 Canadian passport holders travel each year to Israel, but his goal is boost the number to 80,000. The agency is continuing to work with "decision-makers in the Christian and Jewish communities," who help promote missions to the Jewish state.

"Our goal," Alon said, "is to make it a must, not an accessory."

Israel is investing in new infrastructure that will add "new products" for returning visitors, including more than $1 million on bicycle routes. In addition, Israel is promoting wine tours and the "Gospel trail."

Though hopeful the 80,000 figure can be reached, Alon said, "I'm aiming for that goal in the future, but I don't see it happening this year... This year we won't get there, but it will be close."

Finance minister calls PotashCorp's proposal 'un-Zionist'

The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Israeli Finance Minister Yair Lapid last week spoke out against a proposed merger between Israel Chemicals Ltd. (ICL) and Canada's Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan, saying Israelis should benefit from the country's national resources.

Employees of ICL have vehemently opposed the deal, which would increase PotashCorp's grip on the potash industry. The potassium-based product, which ICL produces at its Dead Sea plant, is primarily used in fertilizers.

"Israel's natural resources are public property, and the Israeli public should be the first to benefit from them," Lapid said.

He also called for the creation of a committee to re-examine Israel's rights to natural resources that are managed by private companies.

In late February, before he was named finance minister, Lapid called the sale of ICL to PotashCorp an "un-Zionist act."

The Canadian company is seeking to increase its current 13.8 per cent share of ICL to between 51 per cent and 100 per cent. The deal would require approval by the Israeli government, which holds a "golden share" in the Israel Corporation, ICL's parent company. Such a share allows special voting rights in a company, including veto power on mergers.

Talks came to a standstill as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu struggled to form a new government following January's elections. But in recent weeks, PotashCorp has been renewing its lobbying effort with top government officials, including the prime minister, a known proponent of privatization.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

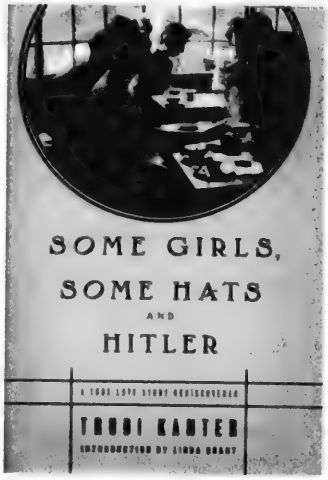
A WWII memoir and near-future fiction

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

In a voice as fresh, direct and charming as Sylvia Plath's, the late writer Trudi Kanter tells the story of her journey through war-torn Europe, seeking safe haven for herself and her beloved Walter, two Austrian Jews hoping to escape the Nazi juggernaut of destruction.

In Some Girls, Some Hats and Hitler: A True Love Story Rediscovered (Scribner) Trudi Miller (the author's maiden name) runs a hat shop in Vienna, city of delicious cafés and nightlife. But on a buying trip to Paris, she realizes the Nazis are preparing to roll their tanks into Vienna (where they will be warmly welcomed by the cheering throngs). All of her Parisian friends and business associates warn her she must not go back, but she returns to try to persuade skeptical Walter to escape with her immediately.



She's been away only a few days but already Vienna has changed, even before the Nazis have arrived. "It's not so much what has actually happened. It's what is going to happen," her shop forelady tearfully explains. "Hitler isn't even here, but suddenly everyone is a Nazi. They've all been members of the party for a long time. They don't hide their swastika pins anymore – they wear them openly. Proudly."

Even in Trudi's own shop, two young seamstresses have become members of the Nazi party. Trudi upbraids them, then regrets her impulsive words. A few days later the seamstresses try to reassure her. "Frau Trudi," one says. "We have come to tell you not to worry. We are members of the Nazi party, and we have told our friends in our group how nice and kind you are. They promised to protect you. Nothing bad will happen to you."

Some Girls, Some Hats and Hitler is a beautifully written memoir of resilience and strength that reads like fiction. The story moves from Vienna to sumptuous Paris, then to Prague, then to blitzed London, which at last provides safe haven. The charm of the love story plus the threat of the Nazi menace combine to give this book the vividness and immediacy of eyewitness accounts such as Irene Nemirovsky's Suite Française, Victor Klemperer's I Will Bear Witness and even the more retrospective non-fiction thriller, Eric Larsen's In the Garden of Beasts.

Kanter's book has a remarkable back-story. A British publisher first brought it into print in 1984, but then it fell into obscurity. Its author, who settled in England with her husband, died in 1992 with no children and so the book became what is called in the trade an "orphaned work of art." Fortunately, a British book lover happened upon a copy in a used bookstore in 2011, recognized its worth, and became determined to reprint it. This Scribner edition is the happy result.

King of the Class (Now or Never Publishing) is an impressive first novel by Gila Green, formerly of Ottawa and now of Israel. It takes place during the time of Israel's civil war: no, not the 1947-48 War of Independence but the fiercely fought civil war that tears Israel apart in 2018 and from which the country is still reeling in 2030, which are also the approximate years that frame the story's action.

In this well-written tale of near-future fiction, Israel's religious and secular communities fall into battle with the result that a second Jewish state is established called Shalem, homeland to haredi and Orthodox Jews. Secular Jews entering Shalem are suspected of being spies or undercover workers, as are Orthodox Jews who enter Israel, where all travel restrictions on the Sabbath have been lifted and kosher restaurants outlawed.

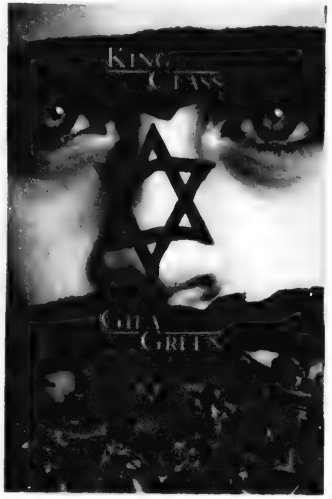
Correspondingly, television is banned in Shalem and only visitors with special visas, such as the story's protagonist, Eve, are permitted to dress liberally. "The only reason she can walk around dressed in ripped jeans is because she has her international student pass, and there have been several movements to cancel this freedom. So far, Shalem has not figured out how to impose its will on its non-citizens and still receive the income those non-citizens bring in, not to mention the co-operation it still needs from Israel on international matters."

El Al, Israel's national airline, has been split into two components, El Al Israel and El Al Shalem, each of which has its own airport. Eve's sister, Jordannah, complains about the way Shalem security officers treat women in the arrivals level: "I'm not about to put a shmatte over my head and some elastic waistband skirt to my ankles so that they'll let me through," she says angrily.

The surrounding Arab nations are also not pleased, especially since Shalem as well as Israel now has its own powerful army. "Israel's immediate neighbours in Gaza and the West Bank, as well as Lebanon, Jordan, Syria and Egypt, are demanding the dismantlement of this second Jewish army, calling it a blatant violation of international law and another Jewish attempt at a land grab," says a newscaster. "In a joint declaration, they stressed they're not fooled by this show of breaking into two separate entities when it is, quote, 'an obvious international ruse.'"

This imaginary world frames the action in King of the Class, which begins when Eve's boyfriend, Manny, with whom she has been living, reveals to her that he has become Orthodox. Eve's inner conflict is compounded when she has a visitation with a supernatural being, a blue-eyed child named Ben who claims to be the unborn soul of the future son that she and Manny would have if they can overcome their differences. Ben begs Eve to find a way to adapt to Manny's religious requirements so they can get married and he can be born.

In the hands of a lesser writer, this strange and otherworldly element would have seemed too implausible for readers to continue to suspend their disbelief. But Green's realistic and minimalistic treatment of the supernatural element somehow avoids being too jarring.



This futuristic satire reminds me of Israeli writer Orly Castel-Bloom's Human Parts or even one of several imaginative novels from our own Margaret Atwood. In short, Green is a talent to watch.

Falsettos is a 'straight through musical, well sung'

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Michael Levinson, 11, plays Jason, the son of rather dysfunctional parents, in the award-winning, groundbreaking musical Falsettos.

Falsettos, directed by Robert McQueen, runs at the Daniels Spectrum cultural centre in Toronto from April 25 to May 12. The show is presented by Acting Up Stage Company, in association with Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company.

"The play is a little bit like the TV show Modern Family," Michael says. "My father, Marvin, divorced my mother, Trina. Trina is falling for another man, and another man is falling for Marvin. I'm in the middle of it and I feel very confused. No one is able to talk to me. Jason is complex, smart, and he is neglected."

Michael – who was a Dora Award nominee for the musical Caroline, or Change, about an African-American maid to a Southern Jewish family – says the biggest challenge of playing Jason is that the character is nothing like him.

Michael lives in Toronto with his South African-born parents, Andrea and Ari, and three siblings – a brother, Asher, 13, and sisters, Hanna, 6, and Izzy, 15 months. He is a Grade 6 student at Crestwood Lower School.

Michael says these days people are more accepting of those who are gay. "Many people who are gay are coming out like a lot of movie stars, and people are starting to accept the fact, but there is still some work to be done.

"I think Acting Up Stage is taking a big risk doing... shows that not everyone wants to hear about, instead of the big commercial shows. The director, Rob McQueen, is a really good director. I aspire to be a director like him one day."

Michael Levinson

Falsettos takes place in New York City in 1979 during the sexual revolution and the rise of AIDS. For this production only, composer and lyricist William Finn granted the use of the text and score of his original one-act plays, Falsettos, March of the Falsettos and Falsettoland, which mirror significant social changes, mainly within the gay community between the writing of Act 1 in 1981 and Act 2 in 1990.

"It is a straight through musical, well sung. The music is jazzy and some rock 'n' roll... it's great music," Michael says.

When he was seven, Michael told his mom that he wanted an agent, and she agreed but suggested he needed acting training first.

"I have a music teacher, Deva Neely at Crestwood Lower School, so we had a couple weeks of lessons with her," he says. "She directed this show called Oliver and asked if I would like to audition in Etobicoke. It was quite a schlep! I was just in the ensemble, but I loved it. So we decided to get an agent."

Michael was a series regular playing Simon on the recently cancelled CW Television and MuchMusic series, The LA Complex. His theatre credits include The Full Monty and A Christmas Carol, and he plays the lead role of Iggy in the soon-to-be-released feature film drama, Algonquin, about a canoe trip taken by half-brothers.

When he's not acting, Michael likes to watch movies and give commentaries on them, make his own short films involving friends and do lots of "kid stuff" like bicycling and skateboarding.

Joining the young actor in Falsettos are theatrical veterans Darrin Baker, Sara-Jeanne Hosie, Sarah Gibbons, Erin Morin, Stephen Patterson and Glynis Ranney.

Falsettos is written by James Lapine and Finn, the music director is Reza Jacobs and the choreography is by Tim French.

For tickets, call: 1-800-838-3006 or visit online at: www.actingupstage.com. Daniels Spectrum is at 585 Dundas St. E., east of Parliament Street.

Political thriller focuses on Islamic fundamentalism

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Mira Nair's The Reluctant Fundamentalist contains all the ingredients of a first-rate political thriller: exotic locales, espionage and intrigue, as well as violence.

Scheduled to open in local theatres on April 24, it is based on Mohsin Hamid's eponymous novel about a smart and ambitious Muslim man from Pakistan whose dogged pursuit of the American dream is abruptly upended by the Arab terrorist attack on the United States on Sept. 11, 2001.

The Pakistani, Changez (Riz Ahmed), is so radicalized by these events that he must choose between the allure of his upwardly mobile career or the siren call of his homeland. The tension inherent in this agonizing choice endows this crackling movie with much of its vigour and elan.

The Reluctant Fundamentalist gets under way with the abduction of an expatriate American academic in Lahore, Pakistan. As it shifts to an atmospheric outdoor café in the same city, Changez relates his experiences in the United States to Bobby (Liev Schreiber), an American journalist who moonlights as a spy.

"Looks can be deceiving," says Changez as the film flashes back a decade to his early days in America.

Nair draws a well-rounded portrait of a Princeton University graduate with a taste for the finer things in life whose post-9/11 disillusionment with the United States drives him back to Pakistan and Islam and away from the western values he appears to have internalized.

The first segment moves at an almost frantic pace as Changez becomes a high-flying financial analyst and valuator at a reputable Wall Street management consulting company. His all-American mentor, Jim Cross (Kiefer Sutherland), is impressed by Changez's smarts, energy and work ethic and sends him off on missions around the world.

But in an ominous harbinger of the future, Changez predicts that he will be the dictator of an Islamic republic with a nuclear capability.

Shades of contemporary Pakistan, a virtually dysfunctional nation riven by the poison of sectarian politics.

As Changez makes his mark on his bosses, he falls for Erica (Kate Hudson), the demure niece of one of the principals of the firm that employs him. These scenes unfold in seamless fashion, enveloping a viewer in Changez's relentless quest for success.

In the second segment, Changez undergoes a wholesale transformation that tears him away from his American roots. As he confides to Bobby, 9/11 was a turning point. As the Twin Towers in Manhattan came crashing down, he recalls, waves of awe and pleasure rolled over him.

But for Changez, glee soon turns to anger as America embarks on the war against international terrorism. At an airport, he is racially profiled, and much to his indignation, he is treated like an enemy of the state: detained, strip-searched and interrogated.

Having been sorely disappointed by what he describes as U.S. arrogance and xenophobia, he grows a beard and modifies his views of the world. This transformation affects his relationship with Erica. As his life unravels, Changez decides to "live in the truth." Retreating to his Pakistani identity, he is recruited by an Islamic extremist group in Pakistan, where he has taken a new job.

With a haunting Urdu soundtrack defining its mood, The Reluctant Fundamentalist, filmed in Lahore, New York City, Atlanta, Istanbul and New Delhi, generally moves along briskly. But at times, it is somewhat disjointed and bogs down in confusion.

The performances, however, are first-rate, and Ahmed and Sutherland are especially effective.

Kiefer Sutherland and Riz Ahmed star in The Reluctant Fundamentalist.

Steve Koven Trio celebrates its 20th anniversary

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

Steve Koven

It's all about to come full circle for the Steve Koven Trio. The jazz group is celebrating its 20th anniversary with special performances in May at the Jazz Bistro in Toronto, the site of the group's debut album.

Their debut album was recorded live at the Top o' the Senator, which closed eight years ago and has since reopened as the Jazz Bistro. The band has now released its ninth album, 20

"Here we are celebrating our 20th anniversary at the home of the old Top o' the Senator, where we recorded our first CD," Koven said. "That's pretty cool."

Koven, who writes the songs and plays piano, admits that he's been really lucky since he was introduced to bassist Rob Clutton and drummer Anthony Michelli 20 years ago.

"Not too many bands have stayed together for 20 years. Just us and the Rolling Stones," Koven quips.

"We work well together. Music isn't just about playing notes – it's about respect, admiration, and the willingness to share and listen to each other."

Included with the new CD is a bonus 20-minute DVD that documents the band's history.

One of the highlights for the band in the past 20 years has been representing Canada in several cultural festivals all over the world.

Just recently, for instance, the band played El Cervantino, one of the largest cultural festivals in North America, held in Guanajuato, Mexico. "We represented Canada and were the only Canadian act," he says. "We were in the middle of Mexico – not in a resort town, in the core. It's an amazing place. That was a big, big one for us."

The trio has been performing international events for around 15 years. "We started to establish relationships with embassies and high commissions around the world, and then word got out that the Steve Koven Trio is a good representative of Canada." Now, the embassies and high commissions contact the band whenever an event comes up.

"Along with this comes a huge responsibility," Koven admits. "We are representing Canada on international stages, and you have to go to these events and dinners and cocktail receptions and interact with people and government officials. We've done a lot of work representing Canada. It's a great label to have."

The trio has played in Barbados, Bahamas, Jamaica, Japan, Ecuador, Colombia, China and several other countries.

Along with performances, these cultural events often include an educational component. The band holds seminars and workshops for university students and even younger children on musical improvisation and self-expression. All three of the musicians are instructors at York University.

"I never thought I'd be doing this," Koven said. I'd never dreamed that I'd be performing worldwide and representing Canada on the international stage."

Travelling also provides Koven with plenty of inspiration for songwriting.

"I get to these countries and get exposed to the way people interact, their food, environment, and you want to capture that through a camera, through video, or through a song or a story. I try to capture one element and use that in my compositions."

At the same time, Koven's developed a love-hate relationship with travel. "I'll be at the airport before leaving and I always say to the band, '10 more sleeps to get home.' As Dorothy said, 'there's no place like home.'"

The opening song on 20 is Cervantino, a song inspired by the festival in Mexico. The CD also features two songs, Bongo Bob and Artists, written as part of his thesis for his master's degree in music composition, which he completed at York recently in his late 40s.

"It was a personal challenge," Koven said. "I've been avoiding it for years, worried about failure. It's the greatest thing I've done at this stage in my life."

His thesis included writing 10 songs based on inspirations from 10 paintings. "I became a better writer. I'm now doing lectures in Barbados about using visual art to help inspire musical compositions and to give the kids inspiration."

The CD features 10 original compositions by Koven. "It borrows from many traditions," he said. "I'm not interested in playing standards. I wanted to write music for this CD that represents where I am in my life. I wanted to venture out and borrow from any element.

"There's very little about swing, there's a lot of pop-oriented songs, soul, R&B. I don't like to call it jazz. Anything you put a label to is very limiting. I want to write nice melodies and music that I feel is me."

Over the years, several of his songs have been featured in TV shows and films. "My music is very conducive for that," he says.

The Steve Koven Trio performs at the Jazz Bistro on May 2, 3 and 4. They also perform frequently at the Pantages Martini Bar. For more information, visit www.stevekoven.com.

Nystrom looks forward to coaching U.S. Maccabiah team

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As the NHL trade deadline came and went on April 3, Dallas Stars forward Eric Nystrom was a little unsure of where he stood. A pending unrestricted free agent (UFA), he was just the kind of "rental" player who is dealt from teams that are out of the playoff race to those hoping to beef up for the post-season. Thing was, the Stars weren't out of the race – they were only a few points out of eighth in the ultra-competitive Western Conference.

Still, the Stars made moves, dealing future Hall of Famer Jaromir Jagr to the Boston Bruins and Derek Roy to the Vancouver Canucks. In an earlier move, captain Brendan Morrow was dispatched to the Penguins. Nystrom stayed put and was on hand to see what few would have predicted: the Stars got better.

Some of the young guys added to the roster gave the team a boost, and as of this writing, the Stars sat two points out of a final playoff position.

"I think it's been a good year. We made a lot of moves to get younger, and we're only two points out of a playoff spot."

"We got rid of two highly talented players, but we got better," he said. "We brought up a bunch of guys."

Still, for Nystrom, losing someone like Jagr was a jolt to the system. Not only was Jagr a supremely talented player who could educate others on what it takes to succeed, but he was also Nystrom's linemate for a time.

"It was a pretty unique experience to be on a line with him, to see first hand the skill and strength and power, even at 41. It's pretty amazing," Nystrom said on the phone from Dallas.

Adding to the lustre was that, as a kid, he had a poster of Jagr hanging in his room.

Playing with Jagr, his role was to "get in there first, get the puck to him. Once I got it, to get away." Those were Jagr's instructions. He wanted the room to go against the defender one on one. "He told me to get away, to go find a spot, and he would put it on my tape," Nystrom said.

The son of New York Islanders' Bobby Nystrom – he scored the Cup-winning goal in OT versus Philadelphia in 1980 – Eric was always exposed to hockey, but never felt any pressure to become a pro.

Growing up on Long Island, he learned to skate at a young age and would be at the rink for his dad's games. He took up the sport and continued to improve. As he got better, "doors opened," he said.

In his teens, he tried out for the U.S. national team development program and made the cut. He played for the junior national team and earned a scholarship to the University of Michigan. In 2002, when he was 18, the Calgary Flames selected him in the first round of the entry draft, 10th overall.

Canadian kids, he said, dream of making the NHL. "I just loved playing hockey."

As he grew up, he received valuable guidance from his father, who retired in 1986 with four Cups to his credit. "He was so great growing up," Eric recalled. "He never over-coached me. He was not a fanatical hockey parent."

His dad helped all the teams Eric played for, but while Eric was a forward, Bob would work with the defence "and was never looking over my shoulder.

"The only time he yelled at me was when I wasn't working hard," Eric said.

Even to this day, his dad provides fatherly advice. He watches Eric's games on TV and will sometimes make suggestions to tweak his game – stuff that Eric might've missed on his own.

One example cited by Eric relates to his high-energy style. At six-foot-one, 193 pounds, Eric is usually a third line digger and mucker. "He'll recognize I'm over-skating and he'll tell me to slow down, or handle the puck more, don't get rid of it so fast."

When he's implemented the advice, he's found it works, Eric said.

Though his dad is a native of Sweden – his family moved to Canada when he was four – his mom comes from Long Island. Eric was raised Jewish, attended Hebrew school weekly and had a bar mitzvah.

Earlier this winter, he accepted an invitation from William (Billy) Jaffe to serve as assistant coach of the U.S. hockey team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel this summer.

"I said, 'Sure, it's a great opportunity to do something so unique, something connected to hockey,'" he said.

This will be Nystrom's first trip to the Holy Land. Jaffe, an NHL Network hockey analyst, served as captain of the U.S. hockey team in the 1997 Maccabiah Games. That outfit lost to Team Canada in the gold medal game, the one and only time hockey was previously part of the Games. Coincidentally, Jaffe played hockey at the University of Michigan, as did Jewish NHLer Mike Brown and Mike Cammalleri, whose mother's family is Jewish.

This will be Nystrom's first attempt at coaching. It's something he's considering full time when his playing days are over. "I just want to go behind the bench and see how it is," he said.

Maccabi Canada organizers have put together a talented roster of NCAA, Major Junior and minor league professionals that should be tough to beat. Maccabi USA has a lot of quality college players to draw from, but Nystrom admits that so far, the recruitment has been tough. "Players are worried about training. It's a big commitment, absolutely."

Many don't want to disrupt their summer training programs, others are concerned about the paperwork and the fundraising that's expected of them.

"I tell them, 'It's a great life experience and it's foolish not to take advantage of it,'" Nystrom said.

For his part, Nystrom is looking forward to the experience. "It will be great to see all those Jewish athletes together," he said.

Knicks' Stoudemire to help Canadian hoops team

Compiled by CJN staff

NEW YORK — New York Knicks forward Amar'e Stoudemire will serve as assistant coach of the Canadian men's basketball team at this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

According to a report in the New York Times, Stoudemire's involvement should boost interest in the team and the international sporting event. John Dore, head coach of the Concordia Stingers in Montreal, will serve as the Maccabi team's head coach.

It was Dore who brought Stoudemire the idea of going to Israel as a part of the Canadian delegation.

"I heard about these games and I know how important they are. When I got the call, it was a no-brainer for me," Stoudemire said.

Stoudemire assisted Dore last summer during team tryouts and training, giving instructions and taking notes.

The Games get under way on July 18. Some 9,000 athletes and coaches from more than 70 countries are expected to participate. Canada is sending a contingent of 600 to compete in open, junior, masters and paralympic classes. The Maccabiah Games are held every four years and are the third-largest athletic event after the Olympics and the Asian Games.

Stoudemire visited Israel in 2010. He described the trip as spiritual in nature. He has said he suspects he is part Jewish.

"It was a bit of a dream scenario to reach out to Amar'e because of his discovering his Jewish roots and his playing basketball," Alex Brainis, the head of Maccabi Canada's delegation, told the Times. "We figured that if he said yes, this would be a big recruiting tool."

When offered the post, "Amar'e was nothing but enthusiastic," Brainis said.

According to the Times, Brainis, a guard, played for Dore in the 2005 Maccabiah Games. Dore's assistant coach there was Glen Grunwald, who had been fired the previous year as the Raptors' general manager but still lived in Toronto. Last year, Brainis asked Dore to call Grunwald, who by then was working as the Knicks' executive vice-president and general manager, to help make the introduction to Stoudemire. On a visit to the Knicks' practice facility during last year's Knicks-Miami Heat playoff series, Dore formally extended the job offer to Stoudemire.

"What he'll bring to the team is individual skill development," Dore told the Times. "He'll also be learning about himself, as to whether he wants to pursue a coaching career. This is his first go-round in coaching. It'll be a great experience for him."

Regina group repeals support for boycotts

"We are shocked that UMSU would ban Students Against Israeli Apartheid without any evidence or basis for the accusations brought forward in the motion," spokesperson Liz Carlyle said in a statement released by the Winnipeg Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid.

Judy Zelikovitz, vice-president of university and local partner services for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, commended and congratulated the local student activists who led the initiative in Winnipeg.

B'nai Brith Canada hailed the vote as "precedent setting" and called on other universities to follow suit.

Not all Canadian backers of Israel supported the move. Ezra Levant, a conservative television commentator and outspoken supporter of Israel, condemned SAIA, but warned that the vote set a dangerous censorship precedent on campuses and made the anti-Israel group look like the victim.

However, Zelikovitz said the resolution does not harm free speech on campus.

"It in no way infringes the right of students to organize or voice their opinions in open spaces on campus. Rather, the motion ensures that student union fees and resources are not misused to promote divisive and discriminatory agendas," she said in a statement to The CJN.

The resolution barring SAIA was the brainchild of student council member Josh Morry, who said SAIA's events were making Jewish students feel uncomfortable, although there haven't been any incidents of violence during its five-year run on campus.

"I didn't have to prove that Israeli Apartheid Week has actually incited hatred, but that it is likely to undermine the dignity or self-esteem of students on campus who are Zionists," Morry told the Winnipeg Jewish Review.

The University of Manitoba has approximately 28,000 students, and Avi Posen, director of Hillel Winnipeg, said the number of Jewish students is "in the hundreds."

The UMSU decision comes after several student unions across the country endorsed the boycott movement against Israel recently, including at York University and U of T's Scarborough and Mississauga campuses.

Meanwhile, the University of Regina Students' Union repealed its endorsement of the BDS movement at a general meeting of the group on April 10.

Although there was no official vote count, Sean Wilson, a student representative who spearheaded the campaign, estimated about 130 people voted to withdraw support of the motion, while around 70 voted against the idea.

"I knew that when people were faced with what [BDS] actually was, they'd vote in favour of repealing it," Wilson said. "The fact of the matter is, us adopting BDS doesn't change anything overseas but it makes our Jewish students feel extremely uncomfortable and alienated."

With files from Cara Stern

U of T Scarborough motion passes by one vote

At one point, as Hillel representatives spoke, someone from outside the room screamed for them to "shut the f--- up," she said.

Hillel students took the position that the student union should support peace in the region, while BDS would simply cast blame on Israel.

She said she was also upset the SCSU didn't notify her directly once the vote was scheduled, and that she only heard about it from others about a week in advance. She added that she only had a few days to prepare after seeing the actual wording of the motion.

Despite the fact the motion was passed, Bergstrom-Borins said she was proud of the efforts of pro-Israel students for fighting against it, especially since there are only about 20 students on campus involved with Hillel, compared to the "huge" Muslim and Arab population.

David Borzykowski, CIJA's campus advocacy co-ordinator, said Hillel's efforts were partially successful, in that the motion needed a simple majority to be adopted, meaning at least eight votes, and therefore only barely passed.

Although several student unions at U of T have endorsed the BDS campaign, Borzykowski said that the vote "means next to nothing.

"The student union can pat themselves on the back, but they're not going to change the policies at the University of Toronto," he added.

"Passing a motion isn't going to change where the university puts its investments."

Israeli music stars to perform at Isrock Festival

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Popular Israeli musicians will bring Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations to Toronto on April 28 as part of the Isrock Festival, a concert designed to bring Israeli music to the masses.

This is the second year for Motek Cultural Initiative, which will be showcasing three musical acts at the one-night-only event at the Sound Academy, designed to emulate Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations in Israel, said organizer Ravid Dahan.

Amidst the event's carnival-like festivities will be a live concert with a lineup that includes hip-hop and funksters Hadag Nahash and rock veterans Mashina, who will be playing with folk musician Yael Deckelbaum.

It's a great time to be an Israeli artist, said Sha'anan Streett, lead vocalist of the ever-political Hadag Nahash. "The entire art world is booming. We have more success than ever before in the world charts."

Hadag Nahash

The band is on tour visiting five North American cities to promote its new album, Time to Wake Up. Streett said the album was largely inspired by the Arab Spring, which he called a time of hope.

"There's a sense the people were taking their fate into their hands and working together for a better tomorrow," he said. "We found that very inspiring."

This album is the band's seventh, and it has more of a Middle Eastern feel to it than their previous releases, he said. While preparing for the new album, Streett said he bought more than 20 Arabic albums, hoping to "let it into my bloodstream."

The fact that the band sometimes takes controversial political stances means not everybody is a fan. Streett described it as only half the people liking them, "but we always have our half."

He recalled one concert in Texas when he found there were protesters demonstrating against their show. The band met with the protesters, and some of them enjoyed the show in the end.

"Our band is for peace. If the people demonstrating are for peace, we have something in common with them," he said.

Someone uninitiated in the band's music can expect to find in the live show a very rich sound, unlike many other hip-hop bands, in that there are many instruments on the stage, he said. "We take it to reggae, rock 'n' roll. It's very live, and it's everything but boring."

Performing in North America poses a challenge Hadag Nahash wouldn't face in Israel – most of the audience probably doesn't understand the lyrics to their Hebrew-language songs. That means that they have to emphasize the groove and the beat, Streett said. "As a group, we focus more on making it danceable."

Michael Benson, bassist and vocalist of co-headliner Mashina, said he's noticed many Hebrew speakers at their past Canadian concerts, but even those who can't sing along love to dance and have a good time.

"Usually they have someone who understands explaining to them," he said, although he admitted the lyrics perhaps wouldn't be as meaningful when translated from its original language.

Since Mashina was formed in 1983, the band has visited Canada several times. Other than the language differences, Benson said he hasn't noticed a huge difference performing in Canada versus Israel.

"There are a lot of Israelis everywhere, so we feel exactly how we feel at home – but it's a little colder," he joked.

Mashina has been a fixture of the Israeli music scene for decades, releasing their music over 30 years (minus an eight-year hiatus from 1995 to 2003). Dahan said although Mashina isn't as well-known in the Jewish Diaspora as a band like Hadag Nahash, their music is embedded into Israeli history and culture.

"You can't understand what is Israeli if you don't know who is Mashina," she said.

Benson pointed out that it's hard to find another band that's been together as long as Mashina has, without any lineup changes.

He said his band's music is not political at all. They prefer to sing about love, joy, dancing, death, family and friends, and many of their songs even focus on real people and real situations.

Dahan said Mashina is especially good at portraying these emotions in a way that listeners find the music inextricably attached to their memories.

The band's sound is not quite rock 'n' roll, Benson said, since that's too "hardcore" of a term for their music. It's more along the lines of pop and ethnic rock, he said.

Over 30 years, the sound has evolved into many new styles, but Benson said these days, the band is returning to its roots.

"We're finding ourselves going back to the beginning, or in any case, a few years after the beginning," he said, adding that it's perhaps an updated version of their early sound that's making its way into their new songs, which they've been recording with hopes they'll release it in the summer.

Mashina has been performing mostly acoustic sets throughout the winter, but band members are ready to plug in their instruments once again for their spring and summer run, including the Toronto stop.

"Anyone who comes will have a great time. I can guarantee that," Benson said.

The birthday party 're-gift'

Married With Kids

Lauren Kramer

Anyone with kids can recognize it a mile away: the re-gift. It's the birthday present no kid really wants – the CD usable only on a game they don't own, or the box containing some outdated gizmo that's been batted around from one birthday party to the next.

Most of us are guilty of re-gifting at some time or other. Sometimes we re-gift unwanted items, other times we use duplicate gifts received at the same party, or toys we bought on sale because we thought our kids would enjoy them.

I've been a long-time advocate of stocking my cupboard shelf with gifts at all times. That way, when my children are invited to birthday parties, I'm prepared and don't have to head out to the toy store. I just reach into my stash of possible gifts at home, pop one of them into a recycled gift bag and wham! We're ready to go.

My son was once re-gifted a toy he'd given to the same child just a few months earlier. I was appalled the gift had come full circle in so short a time, but not totally surprised.

It did catch me by surprise, though, when my friend Sharon called last week, blurting out her dismay at the large box of Play-Dough I'd recently given her son on his birthday.

"No one likes Play-Dough! It's the quintessential re-gift," she declared passionately. "I won't even let it into my house. I can't believe you gave my son a re-gift, especially after all the care I go to in selecting gifts for your kids!"

I tried to explain that the Play-Dough was not a re-gift, that in fact I thought he'd enjoy playing with it. But there was no dissuading Sharon. In her mind, it was a re-gift, and she wasn't having any of it. A day later, it was unceremoniously dumped on my doorstep with a card that said bluntly, "No Thanks."

Choosing a gift for most of my friends' kids is a hard task. These are children who lack nothing, kids with play rooms stocked with toys that, by and large, gather dust. I know because this is precisely the case in my own home. The toys accumulate each birthday, entertain my kids for all of an hour and are then relegated to a dark shelf until The Great Spring Clean, when I whisk them into a bag and donate them to charity.

Kids today are jaded by expensive Wiis, iPhones and iPads. The puzzles that kept me entranced for days on end 30 years ago don't cut it anymore. Neither, apparently, does the humble Play-Dough, its malleable form considered too messy and too "yesterday" for some homes.

It's back in my cupboard now, that box of Play-Dough, but its days as a gift are over. I'll extract it on the next rainy day, glad that my kids, if not Sharon's, can still enjoy the simple pleasure of shaping Play-Dough into faces and french fries.

Hebrew web columnist Yossi Tastassa says that family life has a special significance for Israelis living in Canada.

The boards of the two largest Jewish long-term care institutions in Montreal have voted unanimously to merge.

The Museum of the History of Polish Jews, which officially opens it doors on April 19, the 70th anniversary of Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, welcomed 600 teens from Canada, who were the museum's first visitors in late March.

The young people were part of approximately 10,000 students and adults taking part in the 2013 March of the Living, a weeklong program in Poland that includes visits to once-thriving sites of Jewish life and culture, followed by a march from Auschwitz-Birkenau on Holocaust Remembrance Day, in memory of the victims of Nazi genocide. In Canada, the program is sponsored by Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA and by local federations.

Although the museum's permanent exhibit will not be on display for another year, March of the Living organizers felt it "important that students visit this landmark museum, since it is, in fact, the world's only museum dedicated solely to the history of Polish Jews," said Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada and director of education for March of the Living International.

Three tikkun olam issues

I wrote a column called "The Josh committee" in March. I asked readers to become part of a community committee to get 10-year-old Josh adopted. The response was greater than to any previous piece I penned.

Posts on my blog went through the roof for two days, and the number of "shares" for the column on cjnews.com totalled about 1,500. Most importantly, staff at Jewish Family & Child said they received calls from interested families. It seems the Toronto Jewish community wants Josh to get a "forever home" and is committed to trying. Well done.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Let's now strengthen our efforts and give it another go-around. Please share this or the March column, at cjnews.com. Let people know Josh is a bright, sensitive and loving, little guy and that funds are available through JF&CS and the Ontario government for adoptive parents who need assistance. The "Josh committee" will not disband until we get Josh adopted. Imagine, when Josh is settled in his new home, and a few months go by and he is safe in his "forever home." Contact Marsha Urowitz at 416-638-7800, ext. 6306.

I wrote a series of columns in 2007 about a Jewish woman who was living in her car. She was forced to make her car her home in the cold of the winter because she was – and is – lacking important enzymes, and becomes seriously ill when exposed to potent fragrance chemicals. At that time, we were able to get her off the street. Some kind people stepped forward and assisted her with therapy, the resources she needed and ultimately a home.

Unfortunately, due to a change in circumstances, Rochelle could wind up back in her car again. This time, older and wearier, the prospect is a precarious one for her. Rochelle's challenge is finding a place that is fragrance chemical free (or close). If you know of a house, apartment or condo, or even a cottage, that Rochelle could live in with no exposure to chemicals such as scented detergents, scented soaps and lotions, and chemical-laden cleaning agents, let me know. She can pay an average rent. In spite of everything, Rochelle has a joie de vivre and wants to live the life she deserves to have. I know Rochelle to be a fine person. Contact me if you can help. Thanks.

A few weeks ago, immigration officials came into the home of a local Roma family and handcuffed the father, grandfather and grandmother, in front of their three young children (aged 10, 6 and newborn), and hauled them to a detention centre. The mother cries all day, and the children are too frightened to go to school. A few good Jews were able to put some money together to help them with immediate food expenses, diapers and other such things for their household. In this case, this family was scammed by an "immigration professional" who took their money but never filed their papers.

The Jewish community is beginning to step up to help the Roma and fight the Conservative's government Bill C-31, under which rejected claimants from countries on the so-called "safe country" list are not allowed to appeal. The bill discounts the treatment of the Roma in Europe. Funds are needed, as is a grassroots response. Contact me if you are interested in helping the Roma. Imagine officials coming to your door, handcuffing you and taking you away in front of your children. The trauma will likely never go away. Yasher koach.

The CJN to close

CJN Staff

The Canadian Jewish News will cease publishing in two months.

The board of directors arrived at the decision on Friday, April 19, having regard to the fact that there were still assets on hand with which to provide meaningful severance to the newspaper's employees and to wind up operations properly.

Donald Carr, president of The CJN, announced the decision to close the newspaper "with great sadness." (Please see Carr's message to readers, below.)

The current incarnation of The CJN was founded some 42 years ago. It was the initiative of the late Ray Wolfe, businessman and philanthropist. Wolfe brought together a consortium of individuals who bought the newspaper from Meyer Nurenberger and converted it into an award-winning, nationally oriented, weekly newspaper whose mission was "to serve the Jewish People, in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

With its head office in Toronto, the newspaper published weekly editions in Toronto and Montreal.

The CJN fell victim to the tsunami-like changes that are currently sweeping across the print newspaper industry.

More information will become available to subscribers in the days ahead.

The last edition of The CJN will be June 20, 2013.

Message to our readers

With great sadness, I have to announce that The Canadian Jewish News will cease publishing its printed newspaper with its June 20 edition.

I never dreamed that I would be writing this. No nightmare of mine envisioned it.

For some time, we have known of the ravages that printed newspapers and magazines have been experiencing across the world. The digital age, in which news and commentary are retrieved instantly on smartphones, on computers and on all kinds of new devices, has overtaken the printed word. For the most part, the attractions of printed paper are welcome experiences only for an older generation and appear to be destined to be things of the past. Added to this that much of the world believes that news and commentary should be free.

Newspapers depend for their existence on advertising. It is their lifeblood. Growing numbers of advertisers are no longer convinced that they will get responses to what they pay for in printed publications. Add to that the economic situation in effect over the past few years has left little monies for advertising.

While we were alert to what was happening around us, we hoped that The CJN, with its "niche" attraction, would not be like others, and that our print edition would survive and flourish. We made substantial operating changes, which we thought would assist. After careful analysis, we have concluded that they do not.

We are pained to have to make this decision. We know the role that The CJN has played in the community for the past 42 years. Notwithstanding our editorial integrity and a cadre of superb writers, we face an evolving society, a different readership and changed demands.

If The CJN is to be a vibrant part of the future, it will only be as an enhanced and expanded digital edition. That is our hope. However, The CJN will disappear from your mailboxes and the newsstands.

We appreciate the loyalty of our subscribers and advertisers. As importantly, we appreciate our committed staff – some 50 people – many of whom have worked for the paper for so long and with the greatest dedication.

Reality dictates to us that "for every thing there is a season...."

Chabad Rabbi Dies

VANCOUVER — Rabbi Lipa Dubrawsky, educational director of Chabad Lubavitch of B.C. since 1988, died suddenly on April 7. He was 56. The third child of two Holocaust survivors, Rabbi Dubrawsky and his wife also served in Caracas, Venezuela, and worked for a time in New York City.

WORLD

New Leader Chosen

CAIRO — Egypt's Jewish community elected a new leader, Magda Haroun. The April 16 announcement follows the death of Carmen Weinstein on April 13, who led the community for more than 20 years. "My goal is to preserve the cultural heritage of the Egyptian Jews so that when we are gone it will endure, because it belongs to all Egyptians," Haroun, 60, told the Daily News Egypt. Haroun was unanimously elected to head the Egyptian Jewish Community Council. She told Associated Press there are about 40 Jews remaining in Egypt, mostly elderly women, split between Cairo and Alexandria. "I will continue taking care of them, socially, medically, gathering them for the holidays, and burying them with dignity," she said. Her father, Chehata Haroun, was a nationalist politician who was anti-Zionist, and she told AP she considers herself Egyptian first.

Report Clears School

NEW YORK — Brooklyn College did not engage in religious discrimination in its handling of an event critical of Israel, a report prepared by the City University of New York's general counsel and an outside lawyer concluded. It said the college erred in removing four students for disturbing a panel discussion about divesting from Israel, but cleared it of charges it removed the students because they were Jewish, the New York Jewish Week reported. "It is clear that there was no justification for the removal of the four students," the report said. But since other Jewish students attended without incident, the report concluded "there is no support for an inference of discrimination." More likely, their removal "was motivated by their political viewpoint." Karen Gould, the college president, apologized to the four students and pledged to implement new procedures for public events.

JERUSALEM — Six Canadians are among the 165 Jewish billionaires around the world that have $812 billion in joint wealth, Forbes Israel reported.

The Hebrew magazine released its Jewish billionaires list April 18.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg is in second place with $27 billion, up $5 billion from 2012. He appeared 13th on the world list. Casino mogul and Republican Party political donor Sheldon Adelson is in third place with $26.5 billion and was 15th on the world list.

Pharmaceutical mogul Barry Sherman is the highest-ranking Canadian on the list at No. 57 (with $3.7 billion), followed by drugstore magnate Darryl Katz (No. 81, $2.6 billion), fashion retailer Lawrence Stroll (No. 100, $2.1 billion), liquor heir Charles Bronfman (No. 102, $2 billion), real estate developer Mitchell Goldhar (No. 128, $1.6 billion) and financier Gerald Schwartz (No. 142, $1.4 billion).

Teen experiences life at Queen's Park

Serves as legislative page

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Unlike many teenagers, Daniella Mikanovsky has already been involved in politics – years before she's even allowed to vote.

The 14-year-old student, who is finishing Grade 8 at Thornhill Public School, recently served as a legislative page at the Legislative Assembly of Ontario in Toronto.

During her term of duty, Mikanovsky was a messenger on the floor of the legislative chamber. She met key parliamentary figures and learned about Ontario's parliamentary system of government.

"I first heard about the page program when I was visiting Queen's Park with my family, in the summer before seventh grade," she said. "Near the end of the tour, the guide took us to a mock [legislative] chamber and explained where different people in the chamber would sit. She started explaining about Grade 7 and 8 students from all over Ontario who would also work in the chamber."

Mikanovsky was instantly intrigued and asked for more information. "I was interested about the program because I liked being challenged. I wanted to try something new and different. As well, I really felt that I met the criteria."

To apply for the Legislative Page Program, students must have an 80 per cent average or higher, be living and studying in Ontario, and be involved in the community and responsible.

"I had to write a 750-word essay explaining why I was a good candidate for the program," Mikanovsky said. "At the time of my application, I had volunteered several times, raised and donated money, was on my school's volleyball and basketball teams, was qualified with a bronze medallion [in swimming and lifesaving], worked on my school's yearbook, took care of my school's pets and was on the Media Club."

Where Jews live

Last week, in this space, I referred to the most recent demographic study of the world's Jewish community published in the 2012 American Jewish Yearbook.

The article on population comprises Chapter 6 of a 23-chapter report on the state of world Jewry. The report is a treasure of important, interesting and worthwhile information.

The population study was compiled by Hebrew University professor Sergio DellaPergola. In this column I continue to mine its rich, instructive veins of detail and data.

It is no exaggeration to write that DellaPergola is the Jewish world's pre-eminent demographer. As his biography notes, inter alia, he "holds a PhD from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and is the former chairman and professor of population studies at the Hebrew University's Avraham Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry. He has published numerous books and over 100 papers on historical demography, the family, international migration, Jewish identification, and population projections in the Diaspora and in Israel."

DellaPergola's data is reliable. His observations are sound. His conclusions are insightful.

All the figures relate to 2012. And of course, DellaPergola discusses at great length the various ways by which one might be defined as being Jewish. I avoid any reference to that discussion and will simply report the final figures used by DellaPergola.

In 2012, the number of Jews in the world was 13,746,100.

Israel's Jewish population was 5,901,100. (We know Israel's Jewish population has since then exceeded 6,000,000.)

Throughout the rest of the world, there are 7,845,000 Jews. When one subtracts from this number, the number of Jews in the United States, namely 5,425,000, we are left with a total of 2,420,000 Jews outside Israel and the United States.

DellaPergola provides concise numbers for the Jews that comprise the Diaspora communities.

In North, South and Central America – not counting the United States – there are 758,200 Jews. By far, the largest of these communities is our own in Canada with 375.000. Canada is home to the fourth-largest Jewish community in the world. South America has 329,000 Jews and Central America, 54,200. Argentina's community is 181,800-strong. Brazil's is 95,300.

The total number of Jews in Europe is 1,426,900. The community there will never restore the Jewish civilization that the Nazis destroyed. Of that number, 1,109,400 Jews live in the countries of the European Union.

The three largest EU communities are: France, 480,000; the United Kingdom, 291,000 and Germany, 119,000. The size of the community in the European portion of the former Soviet Union is 276,900.

DellaPergola reports that some 119,600 Jews live in Australia and New Zealand and that 75,300 in Africa. Of this latter number 70,200 live in South Africa. In the once flourishing Jewish communities north of the Sahara in the Arab countries of the Maghreb, there are now only 3,600 Jews. And finally, DellaPergola notes that 40,000 Jews live in Asia.

This latest study by DellaPergola is a comprehensive sweep of world Jewry. In his concluding remarks, DellaPergola notes that most of the Diaspora communities are not growing. (Canada, for the time being at least, is an exception.) Typically, he writes in an understated manner, inviting – if not hoping, too – that we draw the appropriate conclusions.

"It is important to recognize that powerful and consistent trends constantly shape and reshape the demographic profile of world Jewry. It is important that we read current data in historical and comparative context. The recent momentum of Jewish population change in the United States and in most other countries of the world – at best tending to zero growth – contrasts with that of Israel, characterized by the continuation of significant natural increase.

"While the transition of Israel to the status of largest Jewish population in the world is grounded on solid empirical foundations, the United States remains a very large, culturally and socioeconomically powerful, creative, resilient and influential centre of Jewish life. The aggregate weight of other Jewish communities globally – aside from their continuing cultural relevance – is gradually decreasing. In a Jewish world that has become demographically more bipolar, but also more individualistic and transnational, the cultural and institutional projection and influence of the two major centres, Israel and the United States, tends to become more significant in other geographical areas of Jewish presence."

DellaPergola tells us with unsparing, footnoted detail where we are across the globe. He cannot tell us, of course, who we are. That detail lies within our own hearts. And it is for each of us to spend our entire lives to discover and act upon it.

They underestimate freedom's strength

As of this writing, more is known about the manner of the bombings last week at the Boston Marathon, the horrible toll of the human carnage and the details of the demise and capture of the alleged bombers than the motive for and planning of the murderous evil acts.

Two brothers, originally from Chechnya, long since residents and even citizens of the United States – but clearly not feeling settled there – Tamerlan, 26, and Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, 19, were identified by authorities as the suspected perpetrators of the terror. Tamerlan was killed in a shootout last Thursday. Dzhokar is in custody, severely wounded from that same shootout. Early reports last week also claimed that an alleged accomplice was in custody, but that was never confirmed.

Too much information is still missing about the blood-soaked event for authorities to draw all the appropriate and necessary conclusions. But the interrogation of the younger brother is already underway. He is reported to be providing answers to questions.

For the families, however, of eight-year-old Martin Richard, 23-year-old Lu Lingzi, 29-year-old Krystle Campbell and 26-year-old Sean Collier, the four individuals killed in the marathon nightmare and the nearly 200 people injured and disfigured, full justice will be a worthy but comfortless result incapable of filling the space in the hearts left empty by the deliberate concussion of nails, ball bearings and other pieces of shrapnel that ripped through their loved ones and themselves.

Despite the ongoing investigation, we have no qualms in calling the bombings acts of terror by terrorists.

Innocent people in an entirely civilian setting – not military or security or other infrastructure installations – were targeted. Indeed innocent people were hideously and brutally cut down.

The open and free society that was the nurturing shelter of the alleged terrorists, was also, temporarily at least, cut down.

Open and free societies must constantly struggle with the deeply searing conundrum of the extent to which our freedoms can – or must – be curtailed in order to protect themselves from terrorists.

But terrorists, even home-grown ones, always underestimate the extent to which our freedoms give our societies the strength we need to persevere through the human devastation they cause, the resilience we find to rebuild broken homes and broken hearts, and the resolve we share never to surrender our cherished freedoms to those who have no understanding of what a true treasure those freedoms are.

Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres remained Israel's most popular choice for prime minister, but his Likud rival, incumbent Yitzhak Shamir, had managed to close the popularity gap considerably in recent months, according to a poll published in the daily Ma'ariv newspaper.

CIJA has helped

I read with interest the recent two-part series on the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) ("Is CIJA better or worse than what came before," March 28; "CIJA working in a more competitive market," April 11). While there are inevitably mixed views within the Jewish community about our collective advocacy, I would add my voice to those who have found CIJA to be highly responsive to the needs of the local community.

In 2011, my synagogue was defaced by antisemitic graffiti. I immediately called CIJA, which quickly responded with extraordinary support and resources in helping to manage our communications response and security improvements. Perhaps most importantly, CIJA didn't try to take things over. Instead, they quietly helped me and my congregation during a deeply upsetting time.

It is the practical work that CIJA and other agencies do, quietly and often without fanfare, that perhaps has the greatest impact. I for one am grateful that CIJA was there when Beth Tikvah Synagogue most needed support.

CIJA has failed

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) has failed in almost every respect to unite and lead the Jewish community in Canada ("Three tikkun olam issues," April 18). Progressive-minded Jews of all ages who are supporters of Israel but not of the current Canadian government have been largely excluded from CIJA-related activities.

While the fight against recent immigration policy changes has been led in part by Jewish lawyers and doctors (many active in Jewish communal activities), none were consulted by CIJA. On its website, CIJA adopted a position largely favouring the federal government's so called immigration "reforms." If ever there was an issue that demanded a strong and high-profile Jewish response in opposition to the government's policies, immigration policy would surely qualify.

CIJA's fecklessness even reaches into the territory of combating antisemitism and anti-Israel activity. In its first major test, CIJA failed utterly to prevent the United Church from adopting its anti-Israel and boycott position last summer.

CIJA is disconnected and out of touch with the majority of Canadian Jews. The name CIJA makes clear that its priority is Israel, followed by Jewish, and in that order. It is shackled to the current government, believing that support for Israel and opposition to the Conservative government are mutually exclusive. What a mistake. One of the many benefits of the existence of a Jewish state to Diaspora Jews is the confidence, security and safety of such Jews to participate fully in the affairs of their home communities.

CIJA and federations

The article "Is CIJA better or worse than what came before" (March 28) raises some interesting conundrums for Jews across Canada. I met with the now-CIJA CEO, Shimon Fogel, and was told that CIJA, in its formation, had the "hechsher" of all the federations, but with no assurance of their input in decision-making, so there may be some support for the position taken by Prof. Sally Zerker that CIJA does not represent the Jewish community, but only those monied principals who cobbled it together.

Prof. Harold Waller intimates that CIJA's only rival is B'nai Brith Canada. There may be a few BBC lodges scattered across the country, with few members, but it may be mere hyperbole to suggest B'nai Brith is a truly national presence or a representative of Canadian Jewry.

Case study on former Jewish inmates

I am a master's student in Carleton University's religion and public life program. My major research seeks to add to our knowledge of religious accommodation in Canadian prisons by way of archival research and a case study on former Jewish inmates. I'm seeking to interview adult members of the Jewish community who have been incarcerated about their conception of Judaism, as it relates to their time in prison and following their release. With the recent changes in policy to part-time federal-prison chaplaincy, I would like to pay special attention to any religious guidance they received while incarcerated and the challenges they may have faced in order to adhere to Jewish practices. Anonymity will be ensured.

The Herzl comeback

Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka

It may seem like an exaggeration, yet it looks as if Theodor Herzl has been making a comeback recently. For some, Herzl never left; for others, it is Herzl finally discovered. But for all, Herzl has been more in the news in the past few years than previously.

David Matlow of Toronto and his exhibit of items from his collection of Herzl memorabilia, called The Dream Fulfilled: Theodor Herzl and the Jewish State, are a prime contributor, as is his new Herzl video. The Simon Weisenthal Center production about the life of Herzl is another factor.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

And of course, U. S. President Barack Obama has made a great Herzlian impact with his insistence on laying a wreath at Herzl's grave during his recent visit to Israel, his first since moving into the White House. This went a long way toward correcting his major mistake of saying that Israel was created as a result of the Holocaust. We cringed at that thought, with its implication that Israel was a global corrective to the Jewish People for the brutal murder of six million, and the traumatization of every Jew. It is historically inaccurate, as the life of Herzl clearly shows.

Indeed, the return to Israel has been on our mind and embedded in the Jewish consciousness ever since the beginning of our long exile from the land of Israel. For anyone who doubts this, just check our daily prayers, and the thrice daily plea for God to return us to Jerusalem.

Back to Herzl. Herzl is the person who deserves the credit for catalyzing the re-establishment of the State of Israel in our time. He is Israel's George Washington or Sir John A. Macdonald, the father responsible for Israel's rebirth, even though he never saw the fruits of his labours.

Yet, Herzl is not a universally appreciated figure within the Jewish community. For those who did not receive any Jewish education, he is virtually unknown. And, alas, there are many who have received very intense Jewish education for whom Herzl is irrelevant, if not worse. I refer to that part of the Yeshiva stream that does not identify with Zionism, or is even anti-Zionist. For them, Herzl is worthy of disdain, not to be mentioned in the galaxy of significant Jewish personalities. After all, Herzl, David Ben-Gurion, Chaim Weizmann and other Zionist leaders were all non-religious, if not anti-religious. Why, then, should the religious community endorse them, or their achievements, in any way?

The unfortunate upshot of all this is the failure to fully appreciate the redemptive nature of Israel in our time. The great divide presently exploding into the media, related to the haredi community in Israel, is the natural progression of this refusal to acknowledge the theological legitimacy of the Jewish state.

Perhaps it is time to revisit the life of Theodor Herzl. Perhaps, if we can accurately place him in the right historical-religious place, we can undo the great damage done by the failure of so many to fully appreciate Herzl.

The late, great, sainted Chief Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, so instrumental in the promulgation of religious Zionism, argued with great conviction that the absence of religiousness in the Zionist leaders does not detract from their mission, and their accomplishment. Indeed, we can readily embrace Israel's rebirth as expressing God's desire, and therefore containing a redemptive quality, since God's agenda can be fulfilled via non-religious people, even people who do not believe in God.

Parenthetically, the notion of denigrating those who are not religious (read: not as religious as we are, or as religious as they should be), is fraught with danger. It is one thing to eagerly embrace the tenets of Judaism and to happily live by them. It is another to presume that because of this, one therefore becomes superior to others not as observant. This "arrogance of observance" flies in the face of the clear mandate we have to be humble in front of God. Indeed, it is safe to say that the true giants of Jewish tradition never evinced such attitudes, nor did they harbour them. Instead, they genuinely embraced everyone and accepted them.

There is nothing that stands in the way of embracing the re-establishment of the State of Israel as the work of God

The Talmud records an interesting observation regarding King Jeroboam son of Yoash, not the same person as the notorious Jeroboam son of Nebat, but not so different in behaviour. "Rabbi Yohanan said: How did Jeroboam the son of Yoash king of Israel merit to be counted with the kings of Judah? [a reference to Hosea, 1:1] Because he did not accept slander against Amos." (Pesahim, 87b)

The slander is referred to in Amos (7:10-11). "Amaziah the priest of Bethel sent word to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying Amos has conspired against you... For thus did Amos say – Jeroboam shall die by the sword..."

Jeroboam's reaction as reported in the Talmud went as follows: "Heaven forbid that this righteous man should have said that. And if he did, what can I do to him? The Shchinah told it to him."

This fellow, Jeroboam – who was he, and what was his standing? Scripture is quite explicit about him. It records that "he did evil in the eyes of God. He did not turn away from the sins of Jeroboam son of Nebat, who caused Israel to sin." (II Kings, 14:24) Not exactly a scintillating resume. In fact, a roundhouse condemnation.

Yet in almost the same breath we are told that he restored Israel's borders. (II Kings, 14:25) In a most remarkable scriptural observation on the life of this less than laudable king, we are told: "But God did not say to erase the name of Israel from under the heavens, and He saved them through the hand of Jeroboam son of Yoash." (II Kings, 14:27).

The point of this seemingly unnecessary verse, as it states the obvious, is that lest people think Israel was saved in spite of Jeroboam, we are told that Israel was saved through him, by God. If this does not shatter the notion that God works only through religious people, then nothing will. But only someone who stubbornly refuses to acknowledge this truth still maintains such a position.

Now let us see how Herzl stacks up against Jeroboam. Unlike Jeroboam, there is no evidence that Herzl tried to entice Israel into idolatry. Yes, he flirted with the idea of a mass conversion to Christianity, but quickly abandoned that idea. In the desperation of the times, one could readily understand what drove him. More to the point is that he did not make this move. Yes, he had a tree in his home, but in time he got rid of it. There is every reason to believe that within the severe constraints of his terrible circumstance, Herzl was a "hozer b'tshuvah," a true penitent. Even mentioning him in the same breath as Jeroboam is an unforgivable travesty.

Having proven beyond a doubt, and in the words of Scripture itself, that God works even through evil people, we can confidently affirm that it is entirely possible that God works through people who are not identified as "religious," and certainly not evil. Therefore, in the light of what has transpired since Herzl's time, there is nothing, I repeat, nothing, that stands in the way of embracing the re-establishment of the State of Israel as the work of God, expressing God's desires for the Jewish People.

Theodor Herzl

As for Herzl himself, the superficial awareness we have is of a man who is responsible for the re-establishment of Israel. Less known is the depth of his dedication to this cause. It literally took over his life and led to his early death, at the age of 44. He was consumed with the love of his fellow Jews, and unstoppable in his relentless pursuit of a return to the homeland, to escape the virulent anti-semitism and lurking danger to life that Jews faced in his time. His resume is that of a towering figure thanks to whom Jews everywhere have a home to welcome them from imminent danger of any kind.

That qualifies Herzl as a massive lifesaver, a true hero in Jewish history, a hero to be admired by Jews of all stripes and affirmations, certainly no less than Cyrus. Regrettably, the venerated teachers going back many decades never imparted that feeling about Herzl and early Zionism. Those who developed a Zionistic fervour did so in spite of, rather than because of, their education.

Communally, I hope this changes immediately, if not sooner.

The sooner the Yeshiva world places Herzl on the pedestal he has justly earned and genuinely deserves, the better our chances of tackling the great divide that threatens to undermine Israel's coherence as a state for all Jews.

Sticks, stones and the limits of free speech

Amira Hass is an Israeli correspondent for Ha'aretz presently living in the West Bank town of Ramallah. In the past she's resided in Gaza. While having a distinctly pro-Palestinian bent, she prides herself in telling stories that neither the Israeli nor the Palestinian establishments want to hear.

In that vein, on April 3, Ha'aretz published an article by Hass headlined "The inner syntax of Palestinian stone-throwing." In it, she opined that "throwing stones is the birthright and duty of anyone subject to foreign rule. Throwing stones is an action as well as a metaphor of resistance."

Coming in the wake of what some perceive as signs of a nascent third Palestinian intifadah, Hass' article has sparked a public debate, still ongoing, about freedom of speech, morality, journalistic ethics, incitement to violence and more.

Whether intended or not, the piece was published just a couple of weeks after three-year-old Edel Biton of the West Bank settlement of Yakir was critically injured when stones thrown by Palestinian youths hit the car in which she was travelling with her mother and two sisters.

Edel's mom lost control of the vehicle, colliding with a truck parked at the side of the road. All four were injured, Edel most severely. She sustained serious head wounds, from which she has yet to regain consciousness.

And if that timing wasn't troublesome enough, Hass' piece was published the day after the Ofer Military Court, just north of Jerusalem, issued a verdict convicting Waal al-Araja, a member of the Palestinian security services, of murdering Asher Palmer and his infant son Yonatan. In September 2011, while driving near Hebron, Palmer was hit in the head by a rock thrown by al-Araja. He was knocked unconscious and his car overturned in a roadside ditch. Both father and son died at the scene.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Hass and Ha'aretz were assailed soon after her article's publication. Politicians and publicists lambasted them. Leaders of Moetzet Yesha (the Council of Jewish Settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza) lodged criminal complaints against both and held a demonstration outside the paper's offices, claiming the article encouraged Palestinians to continue hurling stones at Israelis in the West Bank, endangering them. As such, they claimed, the article was an act of criminal incitement.

While not addressing Hass' article directly, Brig.-Gen. Hagai Mordechai, outgoing commander of the IDF's Judea and Samaria division, declared that people engaged in stone-throwing were committing acts of terrorism.

Most of those supporting Hass did so less because they agreed with her argument for the legitimacy of stone-throwing, but rather because they believe she has the right to express her opinion and that Ha'aretz was justified when it published it. Some argued that from a strictly legal point of view, Hass' article was not an act of incitement.

Other Ha'aretz writers and its publisher, Amos Schocken, wrote and spoke about the inherent violence of Israel's long-term occupation of the West Bank, violence that must be juxtaposed with that of Palestinian stone-throwers. They also suggested reading Hass' article to its end, asserting that in essence it calls on the Palestinians to use Gandhian methods of civil disobedience, not violence, to confront Israel's military occupation.

I'll admit I'm usually ambivalent when it comes to Hass and her articles. They take me back to my days as the IDF's legal adviser to Judea and Samaria and having to answer what I perceived to be annoying questions from her regarding different aspects of the IDF's presence in the West Bank. On the other hand, I have respect for an Israeli reporter who tells us the Palestinian narrative from within, usually more openly than her Palestinian counterparts. And although her articles are usually critical of Israel and the IDF, she has also criticized the Palestinian Authority on many issues.

But Hass got it wrong this time. Completely wrong.

Yes, she has a right to express her opinion and should not be threatened with criminal proceedings for what she wrote. The debate should continue in the press, not the courts. But by encouraging Palestinians to throw stones at Israelis, she has lost her moral compass and created a double-edged sword that could easily boomerang. Violence is violence. No distinction based on the side one roots for can justify wanton acts of hostility and innocent victims.

Hass and her editors at Ha'aretz should be more responsible in the future.

Israel at 65: positive signs in the political war

In early April, the student council of the University of California at Santa Barbara held an all-night debate on an anti-Israel "Resolution to divest from companies that profit from apartheid." In the vote at the end of this exhausting session, the resolution was defeated, shocking the anti-Israel activists who had invested heavily in the effort to win an important battle on this campus, known for its radical politics.

At almost the same time, the student union at the University of Manitoba voted to deny any support to the organizers of the Israeli apartheid week on its campus, citing the discrimination and harassment inherent in these activities.

The events at Santa Barbara and Manitoba are indicative of a gradual turnaround in the anti-Israel demonization campaigns that began at the NGO forum of the infamous 2001 UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa.

In both examples, the outcome was the result of very strong and convincing arguments exposing the fundamental immorality of the demonization campaigns that single-out Israel for attack by exploiting terms such as "apartheid" and "war crimes."

At York University, where, in contrast to Manitoba and Santa Barbara, the student council recently did the wrong thing by lining up to endorse an instant boycott resolution, media accounts quoted a Jewish student leader who condemned the action as "fundamentally racist." In the battlefield of ideology and ideals, highlighting the immoral basis of the political war to destroy Israel is essential. In the longer term, the aggressive messaging and tactics used to attack Israel at York and elsewhere will turn out to be counterproductive and self-defeating.

For many years, the leaders of this dirty political war have exploited the language of morality, human rights and humanitarian aid without much effective push-back. With no knowledge of the realities, entertainers such as Pink Floyd's Roger Waters have been recruited to join the boycott, giving it publicity. Among some powerful Christian groups, expressions of sympathy for "Palestinian suffering" at the hands of Israel emphasize theological antisemitic themes and images.

But the dominance of the anti-Israel campaigns on the digital battlefields of Facebook, blogs, Twitter, and Wikipedia is now being answered effectively. Similarly, at the United Nations, the blatant double standards of the Human Rights Council have been exposed, including in the contrast between automatic condemnations of Israel and the minimal response on Syria. In parallel, Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch, and their allies are being named and shamed, and the displays of bias that were overlooked in the past now draw negative publicity, tarnishing their moral claims and impact.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Israel, there is growing recognition of the demonization and false narratives that consistently shift the blame of violence and warfare to Israel, while promoting the myths of Palestinian victimhood. A highly professional documentary on antisemitism, old and new, by Canadian producer Martin Himel, was shown in prime time on a major Israeli television channel, triggering extended discussions in the print media and blogs. And the hypocrisy of fringe Israeli academics and journalists who have given the façade of legitimacy to vicious anti-Israel campaigns around the world are subject to well-deserved criticism at home.

Both on university campuses abroad (including in Canada) and in Israel, there are now many more articulate and dedicated activists promoting the legitimacy of Zionism, compared to just a few years ago. In this sense, as well as others, Israel's stock on the international political market is going up, while the layers of fiction and lies leading to demonization are being peeled back. The impact of this revival will grow as more pro-Israel activists are trained and enter positions of leadership.

So, as Israel celebrates 65 years of growth, there is room for optimism regarding the political war. The immoral attacks on Israel's legitimacy and the Jewish right to national sovereignty are continuing, and there are many battles to be fought on this front. But this fight is no longer one-sided, and the recent victories are signs of a fundamental change in the right direction.

Letter from Wurzburg

The Johanna Stahl Center for Jewish History and Culture in Lower Franconia is named in honour of an accomplished Jewish woman from the southern German city of Wurzburg.

Stahl, born in 1895, was one of the first females in Wurzburg to attend university. Then, as a journalist, she wrote for a daily newspaper, the Frankfurter Zeitung. In her spare time, she fought for the rights of women. During the Nazi era, she was a social worker in the besieged Jewish community.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

By the early 1930s, Lower Franconia was home to 8,500 Jews, of whom 2,200 resided in Wurzburg, a centre of Germany's wine industry. One of its Jewish residents, Ludwig Pfeuffer, Hebraicized his name to Yehuda Amichai after immigrating to Palestine and establishing himself as a major poet in Israel.

The remainder of the Jews of Lower Franconia could be found in the towns of Schweinfurt and Aschaffenburg and in villages like Arnstein, Thungen, Obbach and Rimpar (from which the ancestors of the Lehman Brothers banking family in the United States originated).

With the Nazi takeover in 1933, everything changed, observes Wurzburg's current mayor, Georg Rosenthal (who is not Jewish). "They became subject to systematic isolation and disenfranchisement, administrative arbitrariness and harassment and state-tolerated violence, all of which culminated in the pogrom night of Nov. 9, 1938," says Rosenthal, who last year invited former Jewish residents living abroad for a week-long visit to Wurzburg.

During Kristallnacht – a pogrom wholeheartedly supported by the Franconian Nazi leader Julius Streicher, a radical antisemite who published Der Sturmer – the synagogue was set alight, homes and businesses were looted and demolished, and four Jews were killed. Almost immediately afterward, 300 Jewish men were arrested and imprisoned in the Buchenwald and Dachau concentration camps.

From 1941 until 1943, 2,063 Jews from the area who had not emigrated were sent away in five deportations from Wurzburg and in one transport from the nearby town of Kitzingen, says Rotraud Ries, a 56-year-old historian from the state of Hesse and the director of the Johanna Stahl Center for Jewish History and Culture in Lower Franconia.

On June 17, 1943, three months before the community was officially liquidated, Stahl herself was deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau in the final deportation, says Ries, a Protestant whose interest in German Jewish history was aroused by Leon Uris' novel Exodus.

Thirty to 40 Jews married to Christians, plus some children of mixed ancestry, were allowed to remain behind.

At the Shalom Europa Jewish Museum, an annex of the Johanna Stahl Center, the names of local Jews murdered during the Holocaust are etched into six glass panels. I jotted some of their names in my notebook: Frieda Heinemann, Norbert Fulder, David Benjamin, Lina Altmann, Wilhelm Reinstein and Gretchen Lewald.

Eerily enough, the persecution and deportation of Jews were an echo of the past. Jews, having settled in Wurzburg about 900 years ago, were subjected to violent antisemitism during the First Crusade in 1096. Further pogroms erupted in 1298 and 1349. In the early 15th century, Jews were permitted to return to Wurzburg. When they were persecuted yet again in the 17th century, Jews gravitated toward villages in the countryside.

In 1576, Wurzburg's local ruler, a prince bishop, built a hospital on the grounds of a Jewish cemetery. The tombstones were removed and used as building materials.

Construction workers discovered them in 1987, and today, most of the 1,435 headstones are stored on shelves in a locked room in the basement of the Shalom Europa Jewish Museum, constituting the world's single largest collection of medieval Jewish tombstones. A few of them are displayed in glass cases in the museum, which opened in 2006.

It was not until the beginning of the 19th century that Jews were permitted to resettle in Wurzburg. Yet in 1819, in the so-called Hep-Hep riots, which broke out in Wurzburg and spread to other cities, Jews were verbally and physically abused. Nonetheless, Wurzburg developed into a hub of Orthodox Judaism under the leadership of Rabbi Abraham Bing.

At the end of World War II, a trickle of Jews began returning to Wurzburg, which was heavily damaged by a massive Allied air raid in March 1945.

In the mid-1950s, Julius Schuster and his son, David, who hailed from Brueckenau, a town some 80 kilometres north of Wurzburg, returned to what was then West Germany.

Josef Schuster

Rotraud Ries

In 1938, before the advent of Kristallnacht, the Schusters were taken to Buchenwald and incarcerated there for seven months. In exchange for giving up their properties, they were released and given permission to leave Germany in December 1939.

Bound for Palestine, they settled in Haifa. In 1954, David's wife gave birth to a boy, Josef. Meanwhile, having been given back their German properties, they left Israel and settled down in Wurzburg.

"They couldn't manage the properties from Israel," said Josef Schuster, the current leader of Wurzburg's Jewish community – a title he inherited from his father – as well as president of the Congregation of Jewish Communities in Bavaria.

Now a physician specializing in internal medicine, Josef Schuster was raised in a German milieu and felt comfortable growing up in Germany.

"My parents gave me the feeling we were here to stay in Germany. We were not sitting on our suitcases. They told me all about our history."

Schuster's wife, Jutta, comes from a similar background. Born in Berlin, her mother was a "submarine" during the last phase of the Nazi period, surviving underground in hiding.

By the late 1980s, only 200 Jews, mainly of eastern European origin, lived in Wurzburg, whose population stands at around 130,000 today. But with the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, tens of thousands of Jews streamed into reunified Germany.

Hundreds arrived in Wurzburg, bolstering its Jewish population by a considerable margin. "We welcomed them with open arms," says Schuster, who's also vice-president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, the chief umbrella group of Germany's national Jewish community.

These days, 950 of the estimated 1,100 Jews in Lower Franconia live in Wurzburg and its suburbs. And as in the rest of Germany, where there are 110,000 registered Jews in 105 communities, Soviet Jews comprise at least 70 per cent of Lower Franconia's Jewish population.

As might be expected, elderly immigrants have not really adjusted to their new surroundings. They have not mastered German and are dependent on social welfare payments. But their children have acclimatized themselves to Germany and form the backbone of Wurzburg's reconstituted Jewish community.

Shuls must remain relevant, says rabbi

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman of Hebrew Union College believes synagogues that don't change will become irrelevant.

Unfortunately for a packed crowd at Holy Blossom Temple on April 11, a snowstorm kept Rabbi Hoffman in New York for the second in a series of two lectures on "The End of the Shul as We Know It?" co-sponsored by Holy Blossom, Beth Tzedec Congregation, and the Centre for Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

Rabbi Aaron Levy
[J.M. MacLeod]

But with such an urgent question on the agenda, Rabbi Hoffman's keynote lecture was delivered eloquently by U of T's Prof. Jeffrey Kopstein.

"Non-Orthodox synagogues have never been very religious," wrote Rabbi Hoffman. Instead, they focus on gains that "[do] not require them to wrestle with God."

This must change, believes Rabbi Hoffman, the author of dozens of books and co-president of Synagogue 3000, an organization re-envisioning synagogues as "sacred and vital centres of Jewish life."

Will religion here in Canada go the way of Europe, where "tourists [view] religion under glass," Rabbi Hoffman asked, or of the United States, where it's alive and well?

Religious institutions compete just like businesses do, he contends. In the United States, religions have operated in a "free market," while in Europe, established churches have enjoyed state aid.

"As goes the church, so goes the synagogue." In England, the position of chief rabbi has traditionally privileged Orthodoxy, while other denominations struggle for market share.

"The future for non-Orthodox synagogues in Europe is bleak, unless they are forced into the market."

The same is true, Rabbi Hoffman believes, in Israel, "where one brand [of Judaism] enjoys power."

Rabbi Hoffman sketched the evolution of the North American synagogue, from late-1800s immigrants who built shuls on the model of grand churches and cathedrals like those they'd seen in Europe to later immigrants from Poland and Russia whose cultural Judaism fuelled the growth of the Conservative movement as what sociologist Marshall Sklare called an "ethnic church."

When the end of overt antisemitism threatened to make cultural Judaism obsolete, each era redefined the synagogue in various ways: the fight for civil rights, saving Soviet Jews, supporting Israel, and later, life-cycle events, "ritualized demonstrations that family ties still bind."

Today, organizations such as Chabad compete for life-cycle events, and the synagogue is again in trouble, even as evangelical Christianity prospers and "America finds itself awash once again in spiritual awakening" – an awakening too often neglected by synagogues, Rabbi Hoffman argues.

Any other strategy to regain market share usually backfires, as "religions compete not only with each other, but with other cultural offerings."

Religion as community is a lost cause if "synagogues are not perceived as communities that care," he contends.

Courting young families alienates baby boomers with a "purely pediatric religion that doesn't have anything to offer adults."

Meanwhile, leaders still perceive Jewish life as a wheel, with the synagogue at the hub, while young adults seek a less centralized Jewish life, leading to the "growing irrelevance of programs to bring in the troops from the periphery to the centre, and while they're at it, bring in the dues."

"The last thing overly busy people need is more ways to keep busier," wrote Rabbi Hoffman, "but what busy people still need is transcendent meaning... spirituality."

This is where the synagogue may yet find its strength and its future. "As synagogues abandon their old tasks of ethnicity... programs, busyness for its own sake, pediatric Judaism... Can they become communities of meaning?"

Canada, Rabbi Hoffman argues, may find its own answers. It could follow the path of Europe or of the United States, or perhaps, in our climate of multiculturalism, find "a distinctly Canadian model."

Two local rabbis carried on the discussion. Rabbi Aaron Levy, of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism, spoke about how his organization is reaching younger Jews unaffiliated or disinterested in Jewish life through "unabashed Jewish spirituality."

He says some strategies are no longer effective. Programs centred around "the Holocaust and Israel... while understandable... don't appeal to young adults today. Many Jews are now less or not at all concerned with the perpetuation of the Jewish people in and of itself."

Rabbi Levy added: "Judaism predates modern political Zionism and the Shoah by millennia."

Israel remains a beacon of stability in region

As Israel celebrated its 65th anniversary last week, the world's attention was focused, appropriately, on the horrors of the terrorist attack in Boston. The events in Boston caused even the worrying developments in North Korea – and its threats against South Korea and the United States to fade from media view.

Meanwhile in the Middle East, with a great many Arab countries from Libya to Yemen in one state or another of crisis or instability, Israel remains a beacon of stability and a model for the region.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A good news story in the April 15 Times of Israel reported on an Independence Day party that Israel Advanced Technologies Industry (IATI), a high-tech umbrella group, threw in Tel Aviv.

The celebration showcased Israeli innovations and contributions to multinational technology companies before a gathering of ambassadors and diplomatic staff from over 40 countries. According to the Times, many of the world's top tech companies with research and development branches in Israel – including Microsoft, Google, Oracle, IBM and Yahoo – spoke about "how Israeli technology contributes to the bottom line of both their parent corporations and the state."

Drawing on data provided by IATI, the Times reported that "[o]ver 250 multinationals have research and development centers in Israel, 80 of them Fortune 500 companies, with a majority (66 per cent) belonging to U.S. companies. During 2011, international tech companies bought out 83 Israeli start-ups (many of which were either converted into or merged into existing R & D centers), with the buyouts amounting to $5 billion."

This is just a small part of a much larger story of great importance to Israel's well-being, even if it is usually overshadowed by less promising political developments involving Israel's neighbours.

Looking around the region, no country remotely compares to Israel's hard-earned reputation as a "start-up nation" – although Turkey remains the only other country with a fairly healthy economy. Despite hostility from Turkey's prime minister, the state maintains surprisingly solid trade relations with Israel.

Last week, however, Turkey made news for quite a different reason.

The April 16 Globe and Mail carried a Wall Street Journal story from Istanbul that described the suspended jail sentence handed to Fazil Say, a famous Turkish concert pianist, composer and cultural ambassador. His crime? Insulting Islam in some of his Twitter posts.

Fazil Say

According to the Turkish courts, Say's 10-month suspended sentence remains in effect for five years as long as he doesn't re-offend by "explicitly insulting religious values," as the law reads.

In response, Say released the following statement: "On behalf of my country, I'm sorry about the decision reached at the end of the trial. I'm disappointed in terms of free speech. That I have been punished despite an absence of guilt is disconcerting not so much for me, but for freedom of speech and belief in Turkey."

Indeed, with the threat of incarceration hanging over his head, Say will either remain defiant or decide to self-censor. In any case, the effect of his sentence is to inhibit others who dare to speak freely.

In the past few years alone under the Islamic-oriented but "democratic" government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, Turkey has jailed more journalists than either Iran or China.

Say is neither the first nor most famous cultural figure to incur the wrath of Turkey's very limited tolerance of free speech.

In 2005, Orhan Pamuk, the country's most famous writer (and a 2006 Nobel laureate), faced up to three years in jail on charges of "insulting Turkishness" for telling a Swiss newspaper that "30,000 Kurds and one million Armenians were killed in these [Turkish] lands, and nobody but me dares talk about it".

Only under an international barrage of criticism did Turkey drop the charges. Still, Pamuk felt compelled to flee his native country temporarily. And although the law was amended in 2009, Pamuk was ordered in 2011 to financially compensate six people who brought the original complaint over his comment for offending their "honour and self-respect, as well as the feelings of belonging to a nation."

Toronto-area teens get set to perform community service

Compiled by CJN Staff

Five hundred Toronto-area teens will participate in a day of community service and improvement projects when they take part in J–Serve, the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service, on April 28.

They will join some 10,000 Jewish teens from across North America, Europe and Israel, who will all be doing community service on the same day.

J–Serve is the Jewish component of Youth Service America's annual Global Youth Service Day and also coincides with the sixth annual ChangeTheWorld-Ontario Youth Volunteer Challenge. The province's three-week challenge kicked off April 21 in partnership with Volunteer Canada's National Volunteer Week, Canada's largest celebration of volunteers, volunteerism, and civic participation.

J-Serve Toronto, co-ordinated by BBYO in partnership with dozens of youth movements, synagogues and social service agencies from across the city, is one of over 100 international projects in which youth in grades 6 through 12 will participate as they explore the Jewish values of gemilut chasadim (acts of loving kindness), tzedakah (charitable giving) and tikkun olam (the responsibility to repair the world).

This is the fourth year that Jewish teens from across the GTA will have the opportunity to participate in the international initiative, with funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the BBYO Panim Institute.

Participants can choose from more than a dozen project options, including planting trees and shrubs at city parks, assembling education kits for families in need or playing games and hosting a sing-along for young adults with physical and cognitive challenges.

For more information or to register as a teen participant or adult chaperone for the event please visit www.jserve.ca .

In August 2011, Mikanovsky received the good news. "My sister woke me up at around 9 a.m., an early time for me to be awake during summer break. She gave me the phone, and the woman on the other side explained to me that I had been accepted to the page program. At first I didn't believe her and thought I was still asleep and dreaming. But after the second time she told me this, I was ecstatic. I was literally running around the house smiling. I even woke up the next day still happy."

Her term of duty was set to begin on Nov. 13, 2011, but when former Ontario premier Dalton McGuinty prorogued the legislature's session, the program's start date was moved to February 2013.

To prepare for the page program, Mikanovsky had to memorize the names, faces and ridings of all 107 MPPs, as well as where they sit in the chamber. On her orientation day, she was told she had to learn how to get around in the legislative building, and, more importantly, how to deliver four key documents.

"These documents are reports by committees, bills, motions and petitions. Pages take these documents from the MPPs to either the Speaker [of the Legislative Assembly] or the clerks. Of these things, the most difficult task was memorizing all the MPPs."

During a typical day in the program, pages arrive at Queen's Park at 8 a.m. dressed in their uniforms. They deliver messages and water to the MPPs in the legislative chamber, take classes in legislative process and mathematics, and meet with key legislative players, such as the party leaders and the Speaker of the Legislative Assembly.

Mikanovsky decided to document her experiences in an online blog that she titled The Perks of Being a Legislative Page (http://legislativepage.blogspot.ca). She wrote of her responsibilities, being page captain and meeting many important figures.

"I got to have lunch with Mr. Dave Levac, Speaker of the House, and with Deborah Deller, the Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario. I also really enjoyed meeting with the honourable David C. Onley, Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth's representative in Ontario (the lieutenant governor), and Ms. Kathleen Wynne, the newly appointed premier of Ontario."

Mikanovsky said she created her blog because she wants to be a writer when she is older. "I want to write books or perhaps be a journalist. Writing a blog would help me enhance my writing skills. Also, when I was researching about the Legislative Page Program, I noticed that there weren't any blogs that were written by pages about their experiences. If I were to write one, other kids can be inspired to embark on the same amazing journey that I did."

While Mikanovsky enjoyed every aspect of being a page, she said the biggest highlight from her time at Queen's Park was making amazing friendships. "All the kids I met there were so nice, so funny, so talented, so great to be around every day. We spent over 40 hours together every week."

She said the most important thing she learned is how Ontario runs. "It may not seem this way when one looks at the chamber during Orders of the Day, but the MPPs are always busy, always working. Also, there are so many things that the parliament needs to keep track of! I found it almost surprising just how much the people there knew about our large province."

Through her blog, Mikanovsky said she hopes to encourage other students to become a page. "The three weeks I spent at the legislature have been some of the best weeks of my life."

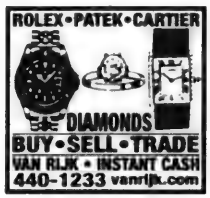
Calgary police decline to lay hate crime charges

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Calgary police will not lay hate promotion charges for materials posted on a Muslim website that attack Jews and cite the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

Const. Eric Levesque, co-ordinator for hate crimes for the Calgary police, said the materials posted on the website, though offensive, do not cross the threshold into actionable hate speech. "Offensive language in terms of referring to Jews leading lives of debauchery may be offensive, but it is not a violation of the law," he said.

Levesque was referring to an excerpt from the website operated by the Muslim Council of Calgary (MCC), which was the subject of a complaint by B'nai Brith Canada. A second excerpt investigated by police originated in the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist antisemitic forgery that accused Jews of conspiring to dominate the world. Levesque said the MCC pulled the reference "once they realized what it was. It's my understanding that as soon as they were made aware of it, once they learned about it, they pulled it."



The materials in question had been removed from the site when The CJN attempted to access them, but copies could still be found online via the blog site, Blazing Cat Fur.

Among the materials downloaded from the MCC site, one section accused Jews of being eternal "enemies of the Islamic ummah [nation] since…Mohammad… began his call to Allah." The site also states it is unlawful to end war or jihad between unbelievers, including Jews and Muslims, until the day of resurrection.

Another quote attributes all internal Muslim problems to Jews' "artful plotting."

In a section on the hijab, the site stated: "Jews have an important role in the destruction of nations through the Fitna (seduction temptation) of women."

Another excerpt stated, "The Jews strive their utmost to corrupt the beliefs, morals and manners of Muslims. The Jews scheme and crave after possessing the Muslim lands, as well as the lands of others." It blames Jews for "spreading destructive thoughts, beliefs and ideologies, such as Freemasonry, Qadiaanism, Bahaaism, Teejaanism and others."

Levesque said the material in question had been posted to the website by a third party, though "it went through a moderator.

"I'm sure they've got a lot of postings coming through and this one got through."

Levesque called the website "legitimate…Hate websites are usually in your face. This is a legitimate website that any religion…would have to give information about their faith."

He was critical of B'nai Brith for asking for a hate crime investigation before contacting the MCC.

"Is it in the interests of harmonious community relations? Do we need to go from zero to 100 and put out a national press release?," he asked.

"Ultimately, what we want is harmonious relationships between these communities…I didn't want to see a legitimate Muslim website being impugned in the media as being antisemitic, because that is not the case."

Jeffrey Smith, chair of community relations for the Calgary Jewish Federation, said the postings were "clearly offensive and clearly antisemitic."

He said the community had been informed about the problematic nature of the website by CIJA, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, and later learned the postings had been there from July 2012. The federation emailed the MCC asking that the postings be removed. "They took it off when it came to the [their] attention.

"It is their position that it's a third party. They have a disclaimer that the views are not the views of the MCC," he said.

In a statement published on the MCC website, the organization's chair, Abraham Ayache said:

"Information about controversial articles placed on our affiliate website, muslimsofcalgary.ca, was recently brought to our attention…We do not condone and fully reject the promotion of intolerance and hate. Having investigated this matter without delay, we promptly removed the impugned material as being inconsistent with MCC's views."

"For any unintentional offence that may have been caused by this material to fellow Canadians and our friends in the Calgary Jewish community, we sincerely apologize."

Smith said he's accepting the MCC's explanation that the material was posted by third parties and that the organization did not know their nature.

He said Jewish community does not have much of a relationship with the Sunni MCC. "We have better relations with the [Shiite] Ismaili Muslims." However, in light of the incident, the federation is asking the MCC for one-on-one meetings. "Our mandate is for interfaith dialogue…We would like to see not just the apology we've seen, but something posted with an educational piece on the Protocols."

Mormon ban on 'baptizing' Shoah victims upheld

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The lay leader of Montreal's Mormons sought to allay any concern that his church is lax in preventing posthumous "baptisms" by its members of Holocaust victims.

Eric Jarvis, president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints' Mount Royal Stake, as the region is known, reaffirmed the church's official policy since 1995 and its commitment to enforce it.

Last year, the church's world leadership, faced with evidence that violations continue, issued a statement reiterating that safeguards are in place and sanctions will be imposed on members who submit the names of those who died in the Holocaust for proxy baptism.

Jarvis, a psychiatrist at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), was speaking at a Yom Hashoah commemoration at the Mormon church in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on the evening of April 14. This was the first time that a Mormon church in Montreal hosted a Christian commemoration of the Holocaust in the 34 years that the event has been organized by the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal.

This commemoration is believed to have been the first of its kind at any Mormon congregation in Canada.

Jarvis said he was grateful to be given the opportunity to "feel less of an outsider" to the sorrow of the Jewish people, with whom he has enjoyed professional and personal relationships.

Jarvis read two statements issued by the church's highest leadership in February 2012 that "strictly prohibit" any member from entering any name other than those of known ancestors for this symbolic conversion to the faith. This is a common practice among Mormons, who maintain one of the largest genealogical databases in the world at their Salt Lake City, Utah headquarters.

"While no system is foolproof in preventing the handful of individuals who are determined to falsify submissions, we are committed to taking action against individual abusers by suspending the submitter's access privileges [to the church's genealogical database]. We will consider whether other church disciplinary action should be taken," the statement reads.

Jarvis said that, as per a follow-up statement, notice of this prohibition was sent to all Mormon congregations to be read out and posted on bulletin boards, as it has been in Quebec churches.

There are about 10,000 Mormons in Quebec in about 30 congregations.

DANI employees aid autistic boy

Compiled by CJN Staff

A boy with autism was returned safely to his family thanks to efforts of employees of DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence), a Jewish organization that supports teenagers and young adults with special needs, according to an email from Toronto Police Service's Const. Rui Simoes.

In the email, Simoes wrote that DANI employees Sarah Levinson and Ashley Orrett found the boy running in and out of traffic near Davenport and Walmer roads.

The two women, who were in the area with a group of DANI participants, called the police, and while responding officers were on the phone, Levinson headed to the boy to try to calm him down and help him, the email stated. She brought him to safety inside a nearby Tim Hortons while waiting for the police to arrive.

The boy was unable to tell them where he lived, and the police had not received a call regarding a missing boy, but Levinson and Orrett determined he was able to direct them to his house.

When police arrived, Orrett stayed with the DANI participants, while Levinson went with the boy to keep him calm as the police drove him home to reunite him with his father.

"It is without hesitation that I could say both Sarah and Ashley definitely made our job easier because of their willingness and desire to help people," Simoes wrote.

Camp Massad hosts 'shtick and song' fundraiser

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A fundraising evening next month continues Camp Massad's 60th anniversary celebration, which began last August with an alumni reunion.

"Massad Live @ 60 – An Evening of Shtick, Song and Celebration" takes place May 26 at the MTC Warehouse Theatre.

The camp's executive director, Daniel Sprintz, said that the director of the evening program is Steven Schipper, the artistic director of the Manitoba Theatre Centre. He will be assisted by up-and-coming young Winnipeg singer Elliot Lazar. Toronto actor David Gale – a former Winnipegger and former Massad camper and counsellor – is the host.

Also performing at the event are the sketch comedian Alan Kliffer, the Alumni Accapella in Action Group and the Camp Massad Alumni Choir. Local musicians Kinzey Posen and Shayla Fink – members of the klezmer group, Finjan – will lead the house band.

"Shtick," one of Camp Massad's programs, consists of satirical plays and songs that campers make up as part of the camp experience – along with the traditional camping activities such as swimming, hiking and sports.

Camp Massad is the only Hebrew-immersion camp in North America. Massad grew out of the Talmud Torah Hebrew School and Zionist youth groups. The campsite at Winnipeg Beach was originally a Habonim camp. With the founding of the State of Israel, most of the Habonim leadership was anticipating making aliyah.

One of the Habonim youths, Soody Kleiman, had spent nine months in Israel. In Israel, he had learned about two Hebrew-speaking camps – both Camp Massads – in Pennsylvania, and he felt that a similar camp could work for Winnipeg as well. On his return to Winnipeg in 1952 (prior to his making aliyah), Kleiman and some friends were able to drum up support for Camp Massad from the leadership of the Karen Hatarbut organization (Labour Zionists). Among their most important supporters was Rabbi Abraham Kravetz, the principal of Talmud Torah, who promoted the new camp to his students.

"Our Habonim camp had always kept kosher," Kleiman said. "And we had a Shabbat service."

Kleiman became the new camp's first senior counsellor and program director. Ed Yuditsky, the principal of the Talmud Torah in Regina, became the camp's first director. Leona Billinkoff was recruited to be the first administrator. Billinkoff had been a volunteer at Talmud Torah and had impressed Rabbi Kravitz with her abilities. She served as the camp's administrator for 25 years and left her stamp on Massad. Billinkoff's late husband, Alec, a builder by profession, helped build the camp's physical infrastructure.

"The programs we set up are little changed to this day," said Kleiman, still vigorous as he nears 80. "I am delighted that the camp has succeeded so well."

One of the Camp Massad board's goals over the 60th anniversary year has been to raise $1 million to revitalize the campsite – located about a 45-minute drive north of Winnipeg.

"We are planning on moving the cabins closer to the surrounding forest and planting trees around them," Sprintz said. "We want to build a new soccer field and a new bus loop. We also want to level the site to improve drainage and install a new irrigation system to keep the grounds green throughout the summer.

Massad and Sprintz also have another reason to celebrate. Sprintz has been chosen to participate in the Foundation for Jewish Camps' Lekhu Lakhem Jewish Camp Directors program. This is a two-year professional development program designed to enhance the skills and success of North America's leading Jewish camp directors.

Jewish gay/lesbian conference slated for Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Arthur Blankstein and Paula Parks, co-chairs of the 21st World Conference of GLBT Jews, believe it was bashert that Winnipeg would be the first Canadian city to host the world's largest regular event for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered Jews.

Parks and Blankstein attended the 2010 conference in Los Angeles. "We thought that some day, it would be great to bring this international gathering to Winnipeg. Well, that 'some day' is here," Parks said.

Arthur Blankstein and Paula Parks

"With the [expected opening] of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights here next year, we thought that this conference would be a great way to promote Winnipeg as the place to celebrate diversity."

Organizers expect some 250 people to attend the event, which runs July 5 to 7 at the Winnipeg Convention Centre.

""We have people coming from England, South America, Europe and Israel in addition to Canada and the United States," Blankstein said.

"We are excited to show off Winnipeg's famous hospitality and demonstrate our world-renowned reputation as a first-class host for international conferences and events."

Event partners include the World Congress of GLBT Jews (also known as Keshet Ga'avah), Winnipeg's Anakhnu Jewish GLBT Group, the Rady Jewish Community Centre, Congregation Shaarey Zedek and Temple Shalom (Winnipeg's Reform congregation), with funding provided by the Asper Foundation, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, the Winnipeg Foundation and the City of Winnipeg.

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, Gray Academy of Jewish Education, Hillel Winnipeg, Jewish Child and Family Service, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, Tourism Winnipeg and Keshet have also signed on as community partners.

The first gay and lesbian Jewish organization in the world was the Jewish Gay and Lesbian Group, formed in London, England, in 1972, Blankstein said. It was quickly followed by the first gay and lesbian synagogues in Los Angeles and New York's Congregation, and by 1975, gay and lesbian Jewish groups were active in San Francisco, Boston, Washington, D.C., Philadelphia and Miami.

The first International Conference of Gay Jews took place in August of 1976, and in 1980 in San Francisco, the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Organizations was officially born. Since then, it has changed its name several times and is now known as the World Congress of Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, and Transgender Jews.

Its Hebrew name – Keshet Ga'avah – means "rainbow of pride" and reflects the importance of Israel to the organization. It has member groups worldwide, and holds annual board meetings, as well as regional and world conferences.

Its goal is to "nurture an environment where gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender Jews worldwide can enjoy free and fulfilling lives," Blankstein said.

"The level of acceptance is much greater now for GLBT people than it was 40 years ago," he said.

"In the '70s, we were still considered pariahs by many people. That is still the case in some circles."

Among the high-profile speakers to be featured at the conference is Joy Ladin, author of Through the Door of Life, in which the Yeshiva University professor, formerly known as Jay Ladin, takes readers inside her transition as she changed genders and, in the process, created a new self.

Also speaking will be former Winnipegger Rokie Bernstein, a rabbi, maggid and spiritual counsellor, as well as Joel Kushner, founding director of the Institute for Judaism and Sexual Orientation (IJSO) at Hebrew Union College-JIR; social worker and Jewish community worker Michael Waxman, and Chicago-area community worker and community leader Carol Goldbaum, who will be speaking about aging.

The latter issue is a serious concern for GLBT Jews, Blankstein said. "It's hard enough getting older when you have a family support group," he said. "Most GLBT people don't have children to look after them in their old age, and many of us who were born more than 30 years ago were cut off by our siblings."

A reluctant goodbye

It was more than 10 years ago that Mordechai Ben-Dat invited me to begin writing for The CJN. My challenges ever since then have been to meet my monthly deadlines and, with each succeeding column, to not only find something current and relevant to write about, but also to tightly frame each piece within a requisite word limit.

None of this has been easy. When the inevitable vicissitudes of life get in the way, writing deadlines get all the more daunting, and I can well remember those occasions when I've come within a whisker of missing those all-important timelines. Nonetheless, for the 124 consecutive months that I've had my articles published in The CJN, I've failed to file on time only once.

Were I a journalist by training, or an author by reputation, I could probably wax poetic about the lonely craft of cobbling words together to create tone and content that is both informative and inspiring. Since I am neither, I can only but attest to the grind of crafting sentences that convey precisely what's intended and selecting just the right words to make sense of a particular construct.

It's therefore amusing, though perhaps backhandedly complimentary, to have someone express admiration for the way I must obviously be able to "churn out" my articles. Nothing could be further from a writer's reality, at least not mine. The effort that goes into structuring each piece is enormous, often involving many hours of research and fact checking even before the laborious process of the actual writing begins.

Yet despite one's best efforts to provide specific context, there are, and

My View

likely always will be, those who choose to fish for any nuance, any perceived hint of affront, that can be finagled into a cause celebre to hit back at the writer, not with a reasoned response, but with a vindictive personal attack. Being on the receiving end of such foolish rants – as rarely as they have occurred – has been especially unpleasant.

On the flip side, my role as a CJN columnist has been immensely positive. It has been at once a welcome distraction from, and a valuable enrichment of, my "day job" as a physician and educator. It has given me the opportunity not only to explore my passion for writing, but more importantly, it has allowed me to engage in the crucial discourse that underpins my core values as a Jew and a Zionist.

When reflecting on the scope and content of what I've written about over the years, I am somewhat reassured, based on what feedback I've had, that my topic choices have usually hit the mark. I have tried often to push the envelope, at least a little, to maybe provide fresh insights, to maybe offer contrarian perspectives, or to maybe just rankle the establishment, with a view to "making the comfortable feel uncomfortable," which is, after all, the very essence of effective advocacy.

In signing off, I would like to thank, so very much, all of those who've read and appreciated – and at times even enjoyed - my articles. I've always found the last paragraph of each column to be the most difficult to write. This one is no exception.

Choosing the right Jewish name

Last week we looked at the significance of Jewish names. Today, choosing them. If you happen to be in the market for a name – or if you want to lend some advice to someone who is – a wealth of suggestions is waiting for you online.

Many Ashkenazim start their quest by considering naming after a family member. Rabbi Paysach Krohn quotes one of the founders of Chassidut in Galicia, Poland, Rabbi Elimelech of Lyzhansk, who said that there is a profound connection between the soul of an infant and the soul of the person for whom he or she is named. "When a child is named after the deceased, the latter's soul is elevated to a higher realm in heaven and a spiritual connection is created between the soul of the departed and the soul of the newborn child." [http://bit.ly/jname12]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

As for guidelines, the Naming a Jewish Baby site addresses such questions as how to honour, whom to honour, how to spell the name and whether you can change your name. [http://bit.ly/jname13] Remember: get your info from a website but before you choose, consult with your rabbi.

Now to get started. First stop: the Bible. As Lisa Katz points out, there are about 2,800 names mentioned in the Bible, but only about five per cent of those names are used today. (Think of how many Davids and Esthers you've met compared to Arpachshads and Maacahs.) [http://bit.ly/jname14]

There are several excellent sites where you can look up names including JewishBabyNames [http://bit.ly/jname15] BabyNameWorld [http://bit.ly/jname16] and the Hebrew site Zooloo. [http://bit.ly/jname17] If you are looking for a Hebrew equivalent to a secular name, type it in at this site and see what you get. [http://bit.ly/jname18] Babynamer.com isn't a Jewish site, but it does index over 700 Hebrew names. You can even specify the first letter of the name and how many syllables you are looking for. With most names, you are given a definition. For example, Liora is "God's gift of light to me."

When selecting a name, parents walk a tightrope between choosing a unique moniker and one that's become too popular. The U.S. Social Security Administration keeps tracks of baby-naming trends. For example, in 2011, "Chaya" was the 715th most popular girl's name and "Chaim" ranked 782nd for boys. (For the record, "Jacob" has been No. 1 since 1999. "Emily" reigned until 2007, followed by "Emma," "Isabella" and, most recently, "Sophia.") [http://bit.ly/jname21]

Of course, Jewish names aren't just for newborns. Rabbi Maurice Lamm has advice for converts who want to choose the right name. [http://bit.ly/jname20]

As many sites point out, your name signals your identity and heritage. That was certainly the case when Stretch Cunningham passed away. Stretch was the pal of Archie Bunker on television's All in the Family. Archie and his wife, Edith, were shocked to discover their friend's actual name and religion when they showed up for the funeral. [http://bit.ly/jname22]

Edith: I guess Stretch must have been Jewish.

Archie: Stretch, Jewish! With a name like Cunningham.

Edith: Oh well, Archie. What's in a name?

Archie: A Jewish name's ain't supposed to have no "ham" in it!

הרמטכ"ל והדיגלון-או: ארץ אוכלת יושביה

לפני מספר שבועות עבר הרמטכ"ל בין קברי חיילים שנפלו לאחרונה ושם עליהן דיגלון. הוא פסח על קבר אחד משום ש"יהודתו של החייל הנופל לא היתה ברורה". קראתי את הדברים והרגשתי שמישהו נתן לי בוקס אדיר בנשמה. חייל יהודי! ואם איננו יהודי-הוא לא מסר את חייו לארץ הזאת! ואם איננו יהודי- הוא עדיין היה טוב מספיק כדי להתגיס ולסכן את חייו. גם בארץ הקשה הזאת-קשה לי להיזכר בחזירות מסדר גדול כזה. ותארו לכם מה הרגישה משפחת הנופל. איך בכלל מתנצלים על בהמיות כזאת!

למרבה המזל- הזעקה שהתעוררה בציבור היתה חזקה מספיק כדי שהרמטכ"ל ישנה את ההחלטה. הוא הלך לבית המשפחה, התנצל בפניה והחזיר שהנוהל המגעיל הזה, שהיה נהוג בעבר, ישונה.

המקרה המטריד הזה מצביע בצורה מאוד בוטה כמה הפכה הדת היהודית המימסדית לגזענית, ואיך הגזענות הזו מדביקה גם את הצבא. ומעניין- רבים מהגזענים הללו מסרבים לשרת בצה"ל, ופה היכתה הגזענות דווקא בחור שעלה מחבר העמים ונתן את חייו.

עידן רייכל- מתעלה על עצמו

מזה שתים עשרה שנה מפתיע עידן רייכל אחת לכמה שנים בתקליטור חדש של מוסיקה ישראלית ייחודית שמחוברת לעולם הגדול. בהתחלה הוא הוציא תקליט שהביא מוזיקה והווי של הקהילה האתיופית, אחר כך הפזורה התימנית כשהוא מקליט את שושנה דמארי האגדית.

הפעם נסע רייכל למקומות שונים בעולם ויצר מוסיקה מדהימה בפורטוגזית,ספרדית, ערבית ושפות אחרות. אולי משהו הנועז ביותר היה להקליט זמר קונטרה טנור גרמני ששר בגרמנית שיר יפיפה. דבר כזה עד לא היה במקומותינו והוא מעיד על רוח חדשה של פתיחות והשתייכות גאה לעולם הגדול.

אותי שבה כליל השיר הפורטוגזי אותו שרה זמרת מדהימה מפורטוגל בעברית ובפורטוגזית כשרייכל מלווה אותה. התקליט הזה הפך לתקליט פלאטינה בישראל תוך שלושה ימים ולטעמי זוהי חוויה שתישאר איתכם לשנים רבות. עשר בסולם קורן.

עצמאות

יום העצמאות רק עבר, ואין ספק שחגיגת העצמאות האמיתית השנה היא עצמאות האנרגיה של ישראל, שבפעם הראשונה בהיסטוריה מפיקה לבד את כל האנרגיה הדרושה לה ליצירת חשמל, ואיננה תלויה בשכנותיה הקרובות והרחוקות. אם מישהו היה אומר לנו לפני עשרים שנה שישראל תהיה מעצמת אנרגיה- היינו שולחים אותו להסתכלות. והינה- "אין זו אגדה".

Rabbinic Reflections

As I write this, the horror of the Boston Marathon bombing is fresh in my mind. I am haunted by the images of runners who trained for years, only to lose their legs in an act of brutal terror. How difficult, then, to turn to the Torah and find this passage in Parshat Emor:

"The Eternal spoke further to Moses: Speak to Aaron and say: No man of your offspring throughout the ages who has a defect shall be qualified to offer the food of his God… He shall not profane these places sacred to Me, for I the Eternal have sanctified them." (Leviticus 21:16-17, 23)

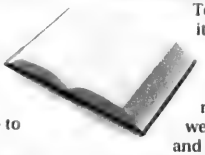
These verses pertain to the Temple service and the role of the ancient priesthood, not the present day. But even for liberal Jews who no longer follow the categories of Kohen, Levi and Israel, we read these words and search for meaning.

What are we to make of this teaching, that the presence of someone who is disabled would profane God's sacred place? We aspire to a world in which people are not defined by their abilities or disabilities, in which blindness or a broken leg would not keep someone from serving God.

Rabbi Jack Riemer challenges us to ask whether our synagogues live up to our best values.

If Yitzchak Avinu, our forefather Isaac, who became legally blind in his old age, were to come into our synagogue and want to daven with us, would we have a large print prayer book available for him?

If Yaakov Avinu, our forefather Jacob, who was injured in an encounter with a mysterious stranger and limped for the rest of his life as a result, were to come into our synagogue and want an aliyah, would he be able to get up to the bimah?



If Moshe Rabbeinu, Moses our teacher, who had a speech defect, were to come into our shul and want to read from the Torah that he gave us, could we handle it without becoming embarrassed if he were to stutter?

And, I would add (inspired by Ora Horn Prouser, author of Esau's Blessing): if Esau came into our synagogue, with a classic case of ADHD, would anyone take time to understand him or train him to become a bar mitzvah?

Maimonides, in explaining Emor, writes: "Most people do not estimate a person by his true form, but by his limbs and his clothing, and the Temple was to be held in great reverence by all" (Guide for the Perplexed 3:45). In other words, if people saw someone disabled serving in the Temple, it would decrease their respect for the community and its institutions.

Today, I would suggest it is the opposite. Many of us have old buildings, and to renovate them is neither easy nor inexpensive. But we too are getting older, and none of us know what life may bring. Today's runner may be in a wheelchair tomorrow, and it is our responsibility to make sure he or she can reach the bimah. Our spiritual homes will be truly holy when everyone can come in.

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow is senior rabbi of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal.

Despondency is a normal reaction to life. Who can live in our society without moments of despair and frustration?

Every morning, the headlines scream of scandal and chicanery. Television relentlessly drags crime, violence and inhumanity into our living rooms. Indeed, the person who does not, from time to time, experience feelings of pessimism must be considered abnormal.

In addition, our own life experiences often lead to disappointment. Our careers are thwarted, our expectations blunted. Sickness attacks us and our loved ones. Pain and insecurity are unwelcome but inevitable callers. There is the tragedy of final parting and death. Is there any wonder that depression is a common experience?

How can we face up to our moods of despondency? In the first place, we should try to achieve a sense of proportion. Why do we so often select the dark and unhappy experiences of our lives and make them represent the whole of it?

Life presents an uneven pattern of health and sickness, love and hate, success and failure. There are times when we reach the apex of the mountain, and there are moments when we languish in the valley. We are born into all of it. There is no cure for life and death, save to enjoy the interval. If we are unwilling to accept life as it is, then we are in the wrong place.

In the second place, we must avoid the temptation of blaming others for our inadequacies and failures. This is not the road to equanimity. A man whose business is failing suddenly decides that his wife is the cause of the downfall. The annoyed citizen finds temporary delight in flaying the bureaucrats. This kind of gratification is understandable, but short-lived.

Blaming ourselves or others is an unworkable escape mechanism. It nurtures the dark side of our nature and blinds us to the possibilities of affirmative and fruitful action.

We are not only shaped by our environment; we shape it. We are not only the creatures of circumstance; we are also the creators of circumstance.

In the third place, although there is no way to deny the tragic sense of life, depression can be lessened if we realize that most situations are not as desperate as they seem. It's not simply a matter of picking ourselves up by our own willpower and moving ahead. It is rather a matter of insight into a dark situation and becoming aware of possibilities.

Life is full of coercions. Indeed, life itself is coercion. And the young never tire of reminding their parents: "I didn't ask to be born." One of Sholom Aleichem's characters makes this wry observation: "The way life is, you're better off not to be born. But who can be so lucky? Maybe one in 10,000." Life is indeed a matter of coercion, but we must accept it gladly and use it wisely.

How can anyone nurture feelings or defeat pessimism in the face of the mammoth tasks that lie before us? We cannot prevent the birds of depression from flying over our heads, but we can prevent them from building nests in our hair.

Longtime volunteer celebrates her 100th birthday

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last fall, Sophie Shinewald became the oldest recipient in Canada of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee Medal for volunteerism.

Now, having just celebrated her 100th birthday on the weekend of April 12 to 14, the still-active senior is looking forward to returning to her normal routine, including serving as one of the volunteers at the front desk at the Gwen Secter Creative Retirement Centre, a program largely for Jewish seniors.

About 120 members of the extended Shinewald family came to Winnipeg from across Canada and from Los Angeles to celebrate Shinewald's birthday.

"We combined it with a family reunion," she said.

The weekend began with Friday night supper in the party room of the Rosh Pina Co-op, the largely Jewish seniors housing complex (affiliated with the nearby Congregation Etz Chayim) where the new centenarian has lived for the past 13 years.

Saturday lunch for out-of-town guests was at the south Winnipeg home of her son, Ed. The weekend concluded with a birthday party for family at Gwen Secter.

Sophie Shinewald is a lifelong Winnipegger who has lived most of her life in roughly the same north Winnipeg neighbourhood.

She said her first volunteering experience came when she was 12 and her older sister volunteered her to teach sewing to students at the Peretz School.

Shinewald is a trained teacher who worked in her early years in the fur business. After marriage, when her two children started school, she began a 16-year career as a substitute teacher in north Winnipeg. She also served as a member of the school board at Luxton School while her children were students there.

After her husband died 26 years ago, Shinewald began volunteering in earnest at Gwen Secter.

"For many years, I used to go in early on Tuesdays and put up the tables for bridge," she said. "I have really enjoyed all the people I have gotten to know at the Gwen Secter."

After Shinewald sold her house and moved into the Rosh Pina Co-op, she organized movie nights on Saturday evenings for residents and some outside visitors.

"Every week, I would take the bus to the local library and select a DVD to show," she said. "A lot of people over the years enjoyed the evening."

The movie nights came to an end about two years ago, when the number of people attending the evenings had dwindled to a very few, and Shinewald decided to "retire" from the project.

She noted in an interview last fall that she was recommended for the Queen's Jubilee Medal by her grandson, Benjamin Shinewald, a lawyer in Toronto who served as national executive director and general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress from 2008 to 2011.

Shinewald attributes her good health and energy to good genes.

"I intend to continue doing what I have been doing for as long as I can," she said.

She's also looking forward to going to Calgary next month for her great-grandson's bar mitzvah.

106 year-old survived Shoah

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Chana Wallace says her 106th birthday on April 10 was a double celebration.

"It is the same week as Yom Ha'atzmaut. That's why I'm wearing blue and white today," she said in an interview at her North York retirement home.

Chana Wallace

Born in Poland in 1907, Wallace married at 19 years old, but lost her husband and son in the Holocaust.

"I was in Auschwitz for four years, and was then sent to Bergen-Belsen. Only God knows how I survived. What we went through is impossible, but [this week] is Yom Ha'atzmaut, and we are free. I can never forgive them, but I took my life back."

When the war ended she said, she made a vow to herself that "Hitler couldn't defeat us. Jews will live forever."

She came to Canada alone, and went to work at a factory on Spadina Avenue. "I didn't know how to sew, but I convinced them to let me try. It didn't take long and I was the best in the factory."

She lived with her brother, Leo Spellman, and did remarry, but "even after my husband became sick and died, I never gave up. I made my brother's family my family and helped to raise his children. They call me bubbie, not auntie. I'm that special to them. They need me and they love me. I couldn't think of going anywhere."

At 104, she was given a pacemaker, and "I had to talk the doctor into doing it. He was afraid but I insisted. Afterwards, he sent me a card to say thank you."

Canada is the best country in the world, she said. "If people talk against Canada, I don't listen. Everybody here is a person. Everybody is free. When I grew up in Poland it wasn't like that. Some people here may not be educated, but we're all equal."

She can't believe she's 106, she said. "I amaze myself that I've lived so long. I'm very tired, but I still know what I'm talking about and my hearing is 100 per cent. I can't complain. God is going to have a hard time taking me.

"Yes, after what I went through, I still believe in God. I've always kept kosher, except in the camps, and I made yom tovs until I was 104."

She loves where she lives now, she said. "I eat my meals in the main dining room, and I go downstairs to socialize. I love to be with people. I love people. One woman didn't want to talk, but I tried and tried to be friendly. Eventually we found out we were in the same camp. Imagine."

It is important to keep her mind active, she said, and every night before she goes to sleep, she counts. "I count from one to 100, and then I count backwards from 100 to one."

MEDIA AND THE MIDDLE EAST

with Felice and Michael Friedson, principals of The Media Line™

Tuesday, April 30, 7:30 PM

Media typically portrays the Middle East as a clichéd series of "crises", more in the form of conventional wisdom than fact. The Israel-Palestine conflict is not the "mother of all Mideast conflicts" nor is Arab Spring a series of isolated events exclusive of Israel. The perceptions and realities of these issues will be addressed.

TML is recognized by readers and the industry—both locally and abroad as "The Mid East News Source™". It is a unique non-profit news organization established to enhance and balance media coverage in the Middle East, promote independent reporting in the region and break down barriers to understanding in the Arab and Israeli journalism communities.

Regina students back repeal of BDS support

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

One year after passing a motion to support the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel, the University of Regina Students' Union (URSU) repealed its support at a general meeting on April 10.

The motion, backed by representative Sean Wilson, who is not Jewish and describes himself as Christian, said the initial endorsement of the BDS movement "resulted in students feeling unrepresented, alienated and treated unequally."

Although there was no official vote, Wilson said about 130 people in attendance were in favour of the motion to repeal URSU's support, while around 70 were against it.

When the pro-BDS motion passed initially last year, roughly the same number of people supported it as voted to repeal it this year. But because the original vote came at the end of the meeting's agenda, and most of the people in attendance had left, there was no one to argue against it, and it passed almost unanimously, Wilson said.

From left, Nathan Sgrazzutti, president of the University of Regina Students' Union, and Sean Wilson, who led the motion to repeal anti-Israel position.
[Neil Petrich photo]

He said he was upset when the original motion passed and contacted the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, "and we started working together." The vote is also what spurred him to become active in student politics, he added.

In order for a URSU general meeting to begin, there must be 150 members present, explained Mike Young, URSU's vice-president of student affairs. However, the meeting can continue even if students leave, as long as there was quorum at the beginning.

The fact the original motion was repealed shows that students want their representatives to focus on student issues rather than get involved in international politics, Young said.

"There's lots of issues that affect students, like tax rates, the conditions of the roads... but I wouldn't call those student issues, because those are issues for everyone," he said.

During the 14 months that the student union was officially in support of the BDS campaign, there wasn't any noticeable change on campus, said Samantha Michaels, a Jewish master's student at the university.

"I think it was more that a few radical students put a huge influence on this and made it their cause," she said, adding that the vast majority of students at the university seem to have little interest in the Middle East.

"It's out of mind here."

She said she never worried about her safety on campus, but URSU president Nathan Sgrazzutti said he did hear concerns from Jewish and Israeli students.

"It almost marginalized a group of our students, because those students felt the motion was against them," Sgrazzutti said.

"There were students who were worried this would escalate to hate crimes. They were worried this would be the first step down that path."

A statement released by Students Against Israeli Apartheid after the BDS endorsement passed last year said the group would work with URSU to investigate its "portfolio for companies that support or profit from Israeli war crimes."

However, Sgrazzutti said URSU has no investments in any of the specified companies, so no changes were needed.

Members of SAIA Regina did not return The CJN's request for comment.

Although there's no official count of Jewish students on campus, Sgrazzutti said the number is irrelevant.

"If there's even a single Jewish student on campus, we need to make sure they feel they are not separate from the rest of the group," he said.

"I would strongly suggest to any other universities considering to adopt the motion to take a step back and think about who they're hurting on campus."

CELEBRATING ISRAEL: Students and staff at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School danced with their counterparts from the Miles Nadal JCC nursery to kick off a day of Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations that included a Tour of Israel obstacle course, a Dead Sea salt mini spa, drumming circles, Israeli Jeopardy and a falafel café.

BOOK FUN: As part of a tikkun olam initiative, Robbins Hebrew Academy senior kindergarten students collected 100 books to donate to Driftwood Public School. Two classes from Driftwood came to spend the morning at RHA. Together the students played games, enjoyed a snack and had a visit from children's author (and Robbins alumna) Gillian Lazanik. The students enjoyed a live presentation of Gillian's book, Climbing Kate, and the author gave each student a copy of her book. How does one define a "high conflict" divorce?

Family Matters

Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP Family Lawyer & Mediator for 31 years

1. Your spouse calls to say Nehama has the flu and for the first time will miss an access visit. You demand a doctor's note at 8 p.m. on a Saturday night or else a Police Officer will be coming to grab the kid to enforce the Court's order, snowstorm or not.
2. Your spouse calls for the 15th week in a row to say that Shaindy either has a cold or she has a special assignment in school or she doesn't "feel" like going with you — or your ex simply doesn't answer the phone again. Your sympathetic lawyer will help but he costs $575 per hour.
3. Your husband has paid his child and spousal support on time to the Family Responsibility Office (FRO) for three years without once missing a payment. Now he's two days late and you phone your MPP asking "Where's Justice?" and demand the resignation of the Director of the FRO.
4. You've paid a lawyer $15,000 to chase after monthly support payments of $2,500 each for several years and successfully obtained Court orders for $140,000 in arrears owing to you. Meanwhile your ex goes on vacations, buys new cars and a new house — in someone else's name. So you ask the FRO to enforce the Orders. And then they make a deal behind your back in which he only has to pay you $150 per month to pay off the $140,000.
5. You have planned a trip to go shopping with your children in Buffalo for the day and you need your husband's notarized letter of travel consent to cross the border, but he refuses. Why? Because in 2003 six Yemeni-Americans living in Lackawanna/Buffalo were convicted of belonging to an Afghani terrorist cell trained in 2001.
6. You spend $17,000 on a parenting assessment, during which your husband suddenly starts diapering and playing with the kids for the very first time. Several months later the assessor confirms that as stay-at-home mother you really are the primary caregiver and your husband consents to an Order agreeing to a parenting schedule giving him loads of time with the kids. Having secured that Order, he then proceeds to exercise only 20% of it.
7. As Dad, you are charged with several counts of assault and battery, of which you are guilty. As Mom, you take him back anyway. One year later, you kick him out when he assaults you all over again, and the kids are a mess.
8. As Dad, you are wrongfully charged with several charges of assault and battery, and are either acquitted or sign a peace bond. But after several months or a year — and by the time the criminal court proceedings are over — you've been out of your own house, forced to relocate further from your place of employment, and estranged from your kids so they may not want much to do with you.
9. Your spouse takes up with another. He/she asks for your forgiveness. You both go to counselling. You reconcile, but the mistrust lingers. One day you discover a sexy message on his/her smart phone. You deny it's "anything." Next day when you come home, your partner is gone, the kids are gone, and all the furniture has vanished. In their place you find a three-word note: "Call my lawyer."

What distinguishes all these cases from those in which the conflict is not so intense? Is it the ability to look the other way, or to forgive when forgiveness is out of the question?

Absolutely not. One should run from violence for example. For the vast majority of couples who don't react in such a manner, it's the ability to "take it down a notch" before falling off the precipice. It's the ability to pull back. To lower your tone of voice; to tell a joke well before disagreements get out of hand; to forego one's ego a bit. To love the other more.

You don't need to be right to make it right. Sometimes the former precludes the latter. On occasion, the continually "righteous" person has even found loneliness to be poor company.

Those of you who have successful partnerships or amicable separations know exactly what I mean, since in the bigger scheme of life these sad conflicts become self-defeating and meaningless. You are the ones who truly understand the meaning of the poet Francois Villon's famous line: "Ou sont les neiges d'antan" (Where are the snows of yesteryear?)

Fundraiser for melanoma features mystical magic

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Into the Mystic, a fundraiser to kick off Melanoma Awareness Month, will feature food, drinks and entertainment that are magical and whimsical.

The event hosted by the David Cornfield Melanoma Fund (DCMF) will be held May 1 at Six Degrees in midtown Toronto.

The DCMF was established in 2007 in memory of David Cornfield, who lost his battle to melanoma at age 32. The fund is devoted to saving lives by promoting awareness of this potentially deadly disease.

Its award-winning YouTube video, Dear 16-year-old Me, is an example of the organization's efforts.

"Dear 16-year-old Me was made to create awareness about the disease and, in particular, prevention targeted at young people," said Sari Cornfield, David's wife and one of the founding members of the DCMF.

"The people in the video are all real people whose lives have been touched by melanoma, and it is a real and honest look at the devastation of the disease. Melanoma is not a disease that there is a lot known about and there was a real lack of education surrounding it."

Melanoma is the most common cancer in the 25 to 29 age group and the second-most common in the 15 to 29 age group. Reducing exposure to UV radiation can significantly decrease the risk, and the prognosis for melanoma patients is excellent if the disease is detected in its earliest stage.

The DCMF has focused its attention on these facts, using funds raised through their events to educate others about the disease.

This year, the organization ran a winter awareness campaign at Blue Mountain and made a donation to Princess Margaret Hospital for melanoma research. Cornfield said the funds raised at the May 1 event will help support the hospital's further research into melanoma treatments and trials.

David Cornfield and his son Noah

When speaking of her husband, Cornfield said, "David was an amazing individual whose life inspired those who knew him to keep his legacy alive through the DCMF. He was a role model and mentor to many and was a positive and influential force in the lives of his family, friends and colleagues."

She said David's "enthusiasm for life, selflessness and generosity will always be remembered. His integrity, passion and desire to make a difference in the lives of others are the essence of the fund."

David was diagnosed with melanoma at age 29. He was in remission for two years, and he and his wife had their son, Noah, during that period. Just after Noah's first birthday, David's melanoma came back and spread quickly. He died shortly afterward.

"During the last few months of David's life, we had the opportunity to have many conversations about the future. David was very clear about his wishes to help make a difference in the fight against melanoma," Cornfield said.

Tickets to the upcoming event are $100 and can be purchased on the DCMF website or by calling 647-393-DCMF (3263).

Reena in the News

Reena

Canadian Soil, Jewish Roots

By: Ellen Rajzman, Manager
Reena Community Residence.

The opening of the Reena Community Residence in September 2012 on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus has increased the number and type of programs Reena offers. The location of the Residence has also provided numerous opportunities to create partnerships with other agencies in the neighbourhood.

One such partnership is with Shoresh, an environmental agency that serves 2400 people annually through workshops, school and synagogue visits, and community partnerships. In 2009, Shoresh opened the Kavanah Garden on the Lebovic Campus. The Garden features over 100 varieties of organic vegetables, herbs, fruits and wildflowers. It also features a havdallah spice garden and raised wheelchair accessible garden beds. Within this partnership, Shoresh staff and volunteers work with Reena's Pathways North Program participants to plant and nurture their seedlings in our Greenhouse until planting time. Shoresh provided the trays, seeds and lamps, and Pathways is in charge of watering and daily care. Pathways/Channels participants are also welcome to volunteer at the Kavanah Garden over the summer and help harvest the fall crop at the community garden.

At the end of May, Shoresh will leave behind some of the seedlings for program participants to take care of as the plants flourish over the summer and are harvested in the fall. The herbs and vegetables will then be enjoyed as fresh ingredients in cooking lessons at the Pathways program. We are delighted with the bounty from our wonderful partnership with Shoresh, and look forward to many 'fruitful' years of planting, growing and harvesting food, flowers and friendships.

Spirituelle Divas to meet at JCC

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A new program at the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre is intended to teach women new ways of connecting spiritually.

Spirituelle Divas, which will meet monthly at the JCC, has women sharing spiritual discussions and uplifting spiritual experiences, and taking part in a variety of programs.

The Spirituelle Divas, a not-for-profit organization started up in 2002 by three women, now has about 250 members in local chapters around the Greater Toronto Area.

Janet Klein Slavin, in the JCC's department of adults, boomers and beyond, said that the goal of the program is to "inspire, support and come together in a warm and welcoming place, where we can explore our inner worlds, develop new perspectives and greater flexibility, and open ourselves up to spiritual growth."

She said that in recent years, she has sensed an openness to alternative practices, and she wanted to bring a course to the JCC.

"I believe [these practices can lead to] a fulfilling life, and can positively impact emotional and medicinal health."

Through networking, she said, she was connected to Rosalind Smith, a transformational life coach and certified master hypnotherapist, who is one of the founders of Spirituelle Divas.

"I thought that it was a great idea to carry on at the JCC what Roz had started. Why should we start from scratch when something out there exists?"

Smith said their original intent was to give women the opportunity of exploring topics such as healing modalities, "which are not considered conventional. We wanted them to share with each other in a loving and caring atmosphere. We're looking for ways for women to increase the spark they already have."

Klein Slavin said that their focus is to embrace and empower women, and allow them to share and feel comfortable. "We are passionate about teaching women to positively channel their energy."

She said that women are not connected to each other in the same way as they were in the past. "In [generations past] women got together to reconnect. Women need other women. They can help each other find a balance between body, mind and spirit. When a person is balanced, everything flows the way it should."

An information meeting on Spirituelle Divas will be held at the Prosserman JCC on May 9, 7:30 p.m. in Room 123. Men are welcome to attend the information session and create their own chapter.

Pre-registration is required at 416-638-1881, ext. 4235.

Hagel confirms unprecedented arms sales to Israel

Aaron Kalman
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The United States will provide Israel with a long list of advanced weapons, guaranteeing it a technological edge and superiority over any enemy.

U.S. Secretary of Defence Chuck Hagel made the announcement Monday during a Tel Aviv press conference with his Israeli counterpart.

The Israeli Air Force will receive advanced radar systems, missiles, refuelling planes and V-22 planes, Hagel told reporters after a meeting with Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon.

The V-22 planes, which can take off vertically, are something no country outside the United States has, Hagel noted, adding that the aid package would give Israel "military superiority over any enemy state, non-state or coalition," and expand its ability to operate far from the country.

"Israel is a sovereign nation. Every sovereign nation has the right to defend itself," Hagel said, calling Iran's drive for nuclear weapons "a top priority" of the administration in Washington.

"Our countries share values, common interests and a permanent bond that grows stronger over time," said the defence secretary, who has faced criticism over past comments regarding Israeli and Jewish influence in Washington.

Standing alongside Hagel, Ya'alon said a nuclear-armed Iran would threaten not only threaten Israel but "it would be a nightmare... for the entire globe."

He said that despite its readiness to deploy military force, Jerusalem would prefer to resolve the Iranian nuclear threat via diplomatic channels.

While sanctions "were causing enormous difficulty for Iran," Hagel said he supports U.S. President Barack Obama's approach and echoed Washington's refrain that "all options are on the table."

The two men also discussed the ongoing civil war in Syria, reiterating that a deployment of chemical weapons there would not be tolerated.

If President Bashar Assad uses chemical weapons in Syria, "it would be a game changer," Hagel said.

"We are ready to act if chemical weapons are transferred. We proved it when they crossed this red line," Ya'alon said, a clear allusion to a February strike against Syrian targets – some reports said they were chemical weapons – allegedly carried out by IAF jets.

Upon his arrival in Israel on Sunday, Hagel told reporters the United States and Israel see "exactly the same" threat from Iran, which he described as a toxic combination of nuclear ambition and support for terrorism.

But he acknowledged differences on when it may reach the point of requiring U.S. or Israeli military action.

Hagel stressed repeatedly that Israel has a sovereign right to decide for itself whether it must attack Iran. "Israel will make the decision that Israel must make to protect itself, to defend itself," Hagel said as he began a weeklong tour of the Middle East.

Israeli expertise helping heal Boston's wounded

The Times of Israel

A decade of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and years of terror on Israel's streets, have sharpened skills and scalpels, leading to dramatic advances that are now being used to treat the 13 amputees and nearly a dozen other patients still fighting to keep damaged limbs after the April 15 Boston attack.

"The only field or occupation that benefits from war is medicine," said Dr. David Cifu, rehabilitation medicine chief at the Veterans Health Administration.

One place help has come from is Israel, which for decades has dealt with the aftermath of Palestinian bombs, like the ones in Boston, often laden with nails, ball bearings and other metals.

In the immediate aftermath of the attack, Massachusetts General Hospital director Dr. Alasdair Conn said the hospital's triage knowledge had come from Israel.

"About two years ago... we asked the Israelis to come across, and they helped us set up our disaster team so that we could respond in this kind of manner," he told reporters on Monday.

Dr. Pinchas Halpern, director of emergency medicine at Tel Aviv's Sourasky Medical Center, was in contact with doctors in Boston last week.

"Unfortunately, we have great expertise," he said.

Halpern gave lectures in 2005 at Brigham and Women's Hospital and Massachusetts General about responding to attacks.

Among the topics he covered in his lectures were how to co-ordinate ambulances to distribute the wounded to area hospitals according to their type of injury, performing more CT scans than usual to locate deep shrapnel wounds and ways to identify and classify wounds.

Dr. Paul Biddinger of Mass General's emergency department said the hospital took much of Halpern's advice.

"We improved our plans for triage, site security, reassessment and inter-specialty co-ordination" following Halpern's visit, Biddinger said.

Many of the first responders on the scene and surgeons at Boston's hospitals served in Iraq and Afghanistan and were able to use their battlefield expertise in the moments and hours after the blasts.

Nearly 2,000 U.S. troops have lost a leg, arm, foot or hand in Iraq or Afghanistan, and their sacrifices have led to advances in the immediate and long-term care of survivors, as well as in the quality of prosthetics that are now so good that surgeons often choose them over trying to save a badly mangled leg.

Tourniquets, shunned during the Vietnam War, made a comeback in Iraq as medical personnel learned to use them properly and studies proved that they saved lives. In Boston, as on the battlefield, they did just that by preventing people from bleeding to death.

Military doctors passed on to their civilian counterparts a surgical strategy of a minimal initial operation to stabilize the patient, followed by more definitive ones days later, an approach that offered the best chance to preserve tissue from large and complex leg wounds.

Nine of the 17 Israelis who registered to run finished the Boston Marathon.

"I finished the marathon, and on my way back to the hotel I heard the blast," runner Tzvika Bronstein said. "At first I didn't make the connection to terrorism, and I ignored it. I even sent a text message to my wife that I had finished, without even telling her about the explosion."

Orit Trumper-Sela, the director of human resources for EMC in Israel, flew to participate in the race after winning a raffle at work. She was already at the final kilometer mark when everything came to a halt. "I didn't understand what was happening," she recalled. "I thought something had happened to one of the runners. It's unbelievable that I came from 'dangerous' Israel to a marathon that ended in such a way. It's incomprehensible."

Yaron Tubin, on sabbatical in Boston with his wife, stopped running 200 meters from the finish line. "The explosion was really right in front of me," he said. "It feels inconceivable that it could be a terrorist attack, but the Israeli head takes over. The Americans around me didn't understand what it was and were wandering around aimlessly, but as an Israeli you understand."

Large crowd protests antisemitism in Budapest

JTA

BUDAPEST — Tens of thousands of protesters marched in Budapest against antisemitism, as Hungarian police prevented a neo-Nazi demonstration for the third time in two weeks.

The march Sunday against antisemitism was part of the annual March of the Living, which usually draws a few thousand people who commemorate the victims of the Holocaust with a solemn walk along the Danube.

This year, however, tens of thousands showed up with Israeli and European Union flags in what many said was a tour de force against the ideas promoted by the ultra-nationalist Jobbik Party and neo-Nazi fringe groups, Reuters reported.

Meanwhile, on Sunday, police banned a group of extreme-rightist bikers from holding a rally in front of the city's main synagogue during the March of the Living event. The biker group already applied for a permit earlier this month and was refused. They rallied under the slogan "give gas," a possible reference to the extermination of Jews during the Holocaust.

Over the past few weeks, several fringe groups have requested permission to hold a protest against the planned gathering next month of the World Jewish Congress plenary meeting in Budapest.

On Saturday, police officers in Pecs in southern Hungary detained 18 people who police said belonged to the Pax Hungarica movement and who participated in a rally in honour of Adolf Hitler's 124th birthday on April 20. They were charged with disturbing public order, according to a report by the MTI Hungarian news service.

Israel Briefs

Rockets fired at the south

Two mortar shells fired from the Gaza Strip struck southern Israel on April 18, causing no damage or injuries. The mortar shells were fired a day after two long-range rockets fired from the Sinai Desert struck Eilat. The rockets launched April 17 fell in open areas in the southernmost Israeli city, according to the Israel Defence Forces. One landed in a construction site in south Eilat. An Iron Dome missile-defence-system battery deployed in the Eilat area tracked the rockets but did not operate to shoot them down, according to reports. A rocket last landed in Eilat in April 2012. A report issued by the Israel Security Agency indicates that since the start of 2013, Palestinian terror organizations in Gaza have fired a total of 15 rockets into Israel. In 2012, 2,157 rockets and 175 mortar shells were fired from Gaza into Israel, most of them during the eight-day Operation Pillar of Defence in November.

Israel opens Nazareth industrial park

Israel has opened a new groundbreaking industrial park in Nazareth to promote economic co-operation between the region's diverse Jewish, Christian and Muslim citizens. Nazareth, located in the Galilee region of Israel, is an ancient city that according to Christian scriptures was the childhood home of Jesus. Modern Nazareth has a predominately Arab-Israeli population, with a sizable Arab Christian minority. The park is funded by Israeli industrialist Stef Wertheimer, who has built several successful industrial parks in Israel and even Turkey. Like the other parks, the Nazareth Industrial Park will be modelled on Wertheimer's innovative Tefen Industrial Park, which is designed to bring together industrial, educational and cultural facilities all in one space to foster innovation, growth and peace.

Gantz reaffirms Israel's Iran options

Israel maintains the capability to strike Iran's nuclear sites on its own, Israel's military chief said. Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz, speaking to multiple media outlets on April 16, said Israel could handle Iran on its own. "We have the ability to deal with the dangers Iran presents to us," he told the Ynet news site. Gantz said Israel still favours sanctions and pressure on Iran, as well as "operational capabilities," which he would not specify to Ynet. They could be a euphemism for reports of Israel's responsibility for cyberattacks on Iran, and for bombings aimed at its nuclear facilities and its scientists. He also told Ynet, "Iran can achieve nuclear capabilities by the end of this year, but that does not mean it will." Gantz told Israel Radio that there were "extensive discussions" between Israel's military and political establishments about Iran, but he would not describe them as "disagreement."

Israeli business school opening real estate institute

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you were to ask anyone, from sophisticated investors to amateurs who like to dabble which capital asset is least portable, you'd likely get a universal consensus that it's real estate.

That may be true enough, but knowledge about real estate – how to finance acquisitions, hire and supervise contractors, market it, manage it – those are skills that are transportable everywhere.

The Recanati Business School of Tel Aviv University recognizes that, so in a bid to boost its profile and create a broader learning environment for its students, it is establishing the Alfred Akirov Real Estate Center. Not too long ago, Asher Tishler, dean of the Recanati business school, was in Toronto to meet business people, entrepreneurs, investors and academics as he "tried to forge co-operation with this school in the local community here."

Speaking to The CJN before jetting off to Montreal, Tishler said the new real estate centre is a response to the growing importance of real estate in the Israeli economy. The school believes, "a healthy and vibrant real estate sector is essential for economic growth, productivity, employment and social justice. As globalization reshapes the international economic landscape, and technological change creates greater uncertainty in the world economy, entrepreneurship in the real estate sector has become critical in helping Israel meet its new economic, social and environmental challenges."

Tishler said he hopes to create mutually advantageous learning experiences for Israeli and Canadian students, as well as academics and others with practical knowledge of real estate development.

Israel has had an active real estate market for some time, along with courses to prepare students to participate in it. "What we want to do is go one level up," he said.

One of the proposals he is bringing to his Canadian counterparts is to have mutual internships to permit students to travel abroad and meet successful developers, and acquire the skills that can be applied back home.

"It's learning by doing," he said.

Likewise, Canadians can travel to Israel and absorb some of that country's best business practices, he suggested. Israel is known for its high levels of entrepreneurship and high tech industry, while Canada is well advanced in areas of planning, finance, marketing and construction. There's a lot to learn for both sides, he suggested.

As for Toronto itself, "It is a very nice market." Lots of Israelis have made a home here and make a living from the real estate market.

"It looks like it's a vibrant real estate community here and Israelis are doing well in it," so bringing a successful businessman back to Israel to lecture on best practices is one element of his proposed plan, Tishler said.

Asher Tishler

Other aspects of the Alfred Akirov Real Estate Institute include: offering a learning program within the Recanati school's MBA program; teaching courses on real estate issues; offering programs in real estate for Israeli executives; conducting research in real estate issues; sponsoring conferences on the Israeli and foreign real estate markets; and co-operating with universities abroad.

Tishler said he plans to return to Toronto in the summer to meet with representatives of local university business schools.

The Akirov Institute is named for the founder of Alrov Properties and Lodging, one of Israel's largest real estate firms. It is expected to attract 50 to 60 students a year. Tishler said donors in the private sector have already pledged $250,000 (US) per year for the next 10 years to fund the program.

Umoove operates mobile devices through head movements

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel 21c

TEL AVIV — What the Kinect motion-sensing device did for the Xbox game console, Israeli startup Umoove proposes to do for your mobile. You won't have to move your whole body – only the parts from the chin up – to play games, scroll down a page or dial your mother.

"Kinect holds a Guinness record for being the fastest-selling consumer electronics device because it was much more immersive and engaging than other ways to play," said Moti Krispil, one of the company's founders.

"We are following that paradigm in the mobile space, where the only thing visible is your head and eyes. You are constantly looking at the screen, so why shouldn't they become the interface?"

Krispil, 34, co-founded Umoove in 2010 along with Yitzi Kempinski, Nir Blaustein and Tuvia Elbaum, who is still a student at the Jerusalem College of Technology-Machon Lev. Based in Jerusalem, the company now employs 13, including four additional Machon Lev students or graduates.

"Many companies are trying to decipher the DNA of how to do this, but most probably we are the first to achieve consumer-grade performance using no special hardware at all – just your phone," Krispil told Israel21c.

"Everyone wants to deliver something robust enough to work, and that can be scaled down to performance on a mobile phone. That's the reason for our existence."

While Kinect's sophisticated hardware setup – built on the 3D sensing technology of the Israeli company PrimeSense – has the operational advantage of being fixed below the TV or PC, that also limits its distance-to-user range. A mobile device offers different possibilities and challenges.

Umoove is based on technology pioneered by Kempinski, now chief technology officer of the company. Originally searching for an affordable solution to allow paralyzed people to read content or browse the web using only their face muscles, Kempinski found that existing technologies failed to deliver under extreme conditions – aside from pricey setups involving multiple hardware devices.

"So he built an intelligent solution from scratch that contradicts any known algorithm out there," said Krispil. "Once we delved into this challenge, we discovered what we want is much, much bigger – extremely disruptive in potential."

Umoove began with $850,000 (all figures US) and got another $2 million from a strategic investor in April 2012.

The head-tracking technology is already being integrated on some games, and is available to third-party partners and developers for gaming, commerce, security and entertainment on all mobile platforms.

Krispil recently demonstrated Umoove at the Mobile World Congress in Barcelona, Spain, and is in talks with potential corporate prospects.

"It's easy to show customers how the quality of life of a typical user can dramatically improve when browsing the web, watching a video, playing a game. Head and eye tracking simplifies everyday tasks – not just games and not just for people with disabilities. Daily functionality becomes hands-free."

Imagine a video player that automatically pauses when you raise your head to look at someone calling you, and then continues playing when you look back at the screen.

"Once you get used to the concept, it becomes a language to use in many other places," says Krispil, whose four-year-old daughter uses Umoove to play game apps as she's moving from room to room and even outdoors.

"The application possibilities are endless," says Krispil. "Our strategy is driven by the vision to be the de facto standard for natural user interface on mobile devices. We're not just delivering technology, but actually suggesting a new language."

Author records what he sees from a café table

Publishers and readers transform a writer's reputation over time, sometimes without meaning to. A writer may take such liberties himself, by seizing his own career in order to send it someplace new.

Recent reviews of the first novel in more than 30 years by the American writer James Salter provide excellent evidence of this: while in the U.S. Army during World War II, Salter, born James Horowitz, decided that he didn't want to be thought of as another Jewish writer from New York. In renaming himself he became a different kind of New York writer; someone, one imagines, he could live with more easily as he created the persona his readers and the writers influenced by him came to know and revere.

Publishers take similar liberties, leaving readers to either accept a writer as presented or to undertake a kind of literary sleuthing, to confirm who the author once was, and still might be, regardless of what the biographical materials on a book flap might say.

Norman Ravvin

A recent translation of the major French Jewish author Georges Perec contributes to an ongoing renewal and revision of Perec's legacy. An Attempt at Exhausting a Place in Paris (Wakefield Press), a minor work Perec completed before embarking on his 1978 masterpiece, known in English as Life: A User's Manual. An Attempt is a tiny thing, really a reproduction of a note-taking process Perec embarked on in the Paris neighbourhood of Saint-Sulpice, which begins: "Outline of an inventory of some strictly visible things."

The U.S. publisher of An Attempt suggests that the author's goal was to record "everything to pass through his field of vision" as he sat at a succession of café tables in the venerable Parisian neighbourhood. But this is a far-fetched claim. To do this, Perec would have had to produce a 70-page book like Life: A User's Manual. He would have had to sit at his post at Tabac Saint-Sulpice for many days. He would have had to supply an intensely detailed wash of daily and nightly events, a kind of screenplay, full of long shots, close-ups and deep atmospheric detailing, not the sketch of passing traffic, pedestrians and weather that makes up his "attempt" to exhaust his neighbourhood.

What passes under the eye of the author in the fall of 1974, some two years before he began the book that would make him a postmodern icon in Europe and North America? Japanese tourists; schoolgirls with bags on their back; men with baguettes; many, many "apple-green" Citroën 2CV's; the 96 bus to Montparnasse; the 86 to Saint-Germain-des-Prés; pigeons travelling from ground to building cornice and back again; a "sort of double of Peter Sellers, with a very pleased expression on his face"; "grannies wearing gloves"; "a priest in a beret"; meter maids; "Four children. A dog. A little ray of sun. The 96. It is two o'clock."

This phrase concludes An Attempt, and the very particularity of the book's final anecdote is telling. The anonymous bus; the suggestion of sunlight; the meagerness of the details on offer; these things are, by no means, a catalogue of "everything to pass through" Perec's "field of vision."

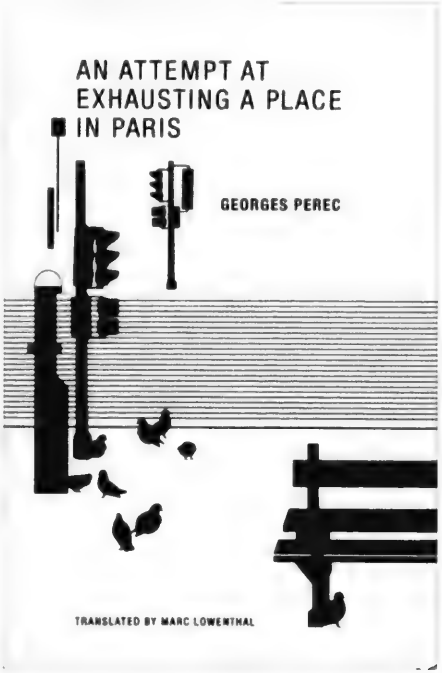
And who is the author of these sketches? According to the American publishers of An Attempt at Exhausting a Place in Paris, Perec is: "(1936-1982)... a French novelist, essayist and filmmaker whose linguistic talents ranged from fiction to crossword puzzles... Winner of the the prix Renaudot in 1965 for his first novel Things, and the prix Médicis in 1978 for his most acclaimed novel, Life: A User's Manual, Perec was also a member of Oulipo, a group of writers and mathematicians devoted to the discovery and use of constraints to encourage literary inspiration. One of their most famous products was Perec's own novel, A Void, written entirely without the letter "e."

Sounds like fun. But this is not the whole story. Perec's parents were Polish-born Jews who arrived in France in the 1920s. They traced their ancestry to I. L. Peretz, whose connection to them was hidden by the erasure of a "z" in favour of a "c" ("z" might stand for Zamosc, Peretz's Polish hometown). When the war broke out, Perec's father was killed early, as a combatant on the French side facing German invasion. Perec was sent to be hidden near Grenoble in the French Alps, where his mother meant to join him, but she was arrested and deported to Auschwitz where she was murdered.

Knowing these details changes our picture of the man in the window, watching Paris in the fall of 1974. Knowing the difference a "c" makes in a name helps us think about the novelist who chose to write a book without "e's."

When Perec returned to Paris after the war, his parents dead, he found his neighbourhood in ruins. These facts do not mean that Jewishness underwrites everything Perec did; nor do they necessarily demand that a publisher of a work like An Attempt at Exhausting a Place in Paris dwell on what, to Perec's readers, may be well-known facts. But one wants some inkling of the texture of an author's self-image, his formative years, his place in European literature and culture, when opening his book. Early in An Attempt Perec notes that there are a great many things in Saint-Sulpice that are well-known – a church built by famous craftsmen, a fountain decorated with statues of Christian orators – but his intention is, he says, to describe "the rest... that which is not noticed."

In this new incarnation Perec is as historyless as the pigeons and the schoolgirls, the grannies in gloves and the apple-green 2CV's. The writer, against the backdrop of a square full of church statuary, becomes another native ornament, a passive cataloguer of Frenchness and weather patterns.



Norman Ravvin's recent novel is The Joyful Child (Gaspereau Press). He is at work on a novel, The Typewriter Girl, set in Poland and in Vancouver.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jays' reliever starts season on disabled list

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you're a Major League ball player, the last place you want to be is on the disabled list.

Yet, as the season kicked off, that's exactly where Blue Jays' reliever Michael Schwimer found himself. While his teammates started the season with expectations of a playoff position in mind, if not a berth in the World Series, Schwimer found himself back in Florida, rehabbing, building up strength and slowly getting some pitches in.

Schwimer missed the opening two weeks of the season with a shoulder injury; that was the bad news. The good news is that it isn't the same injury that plagued him last year as a member of the Philadelphia Phillies. That was a biceps injury, but when he spoke to The CJN on the telephone from Florida, he proclaimed himself healed and raring to go.

"Right now, I'm getting better every day," he said. "There's no real timetable. I'm healthy, with no pain in my arm.

"I need to build up my arm strength. I'm hopeful to be out of here shortly, but I don't know."

"Every day is better than the next. It shouldn't be long."

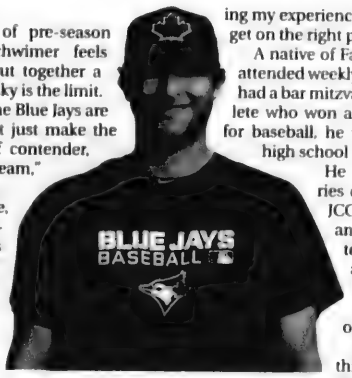
Schwimer is one of the new crop of players management hopes turns the team into a contender. He was acquired during spring training from the Philadelphia Phillies for minor-league player Art Charles. A right-handed reliever, Schwimer stands six-foot-eight and weights 246 pounds. According to NBC Sports, "Schwimer was given away to the Blue Jays because he threatened a grievance over how the Phillies handled an injury last year."

Playing in his rookie season with the Phillies last year, the Virginia-born athlete came out of the bullpen 47 times and fashioned a 2-1 record with a 4.46 ERA. He threw strikes with regularity. In 34.1 innings he fanned 36.

For Schwimer, the Phillies was the only Major League organization he knew, but "going to a new organization was exciting." His experience with the Blue Jays has been positive. "It's a good team, a good clubhouse," he said.

And like a lot of pre-season prognosticators, Schwimer feels management has put together a team for whom the sky is the limit. "You can see what the Blue Jays are doing brilliantly, not just make the team into a playoff contender, but a World Series team," he said.

With that attitude, Schwimer is not worried about the team's slow start. From the time he spoke to The CJN to the time this story appears in print, the team made strides. At press time, The Blue Jays were only 2.5 games back of Boston in the American League East.



Michael Schwimer

For the worrywarts among us, Schwimer said that there are 162 games in the season. "The slow start, that's for people and fans to get worried about. Among the players, I assume, there's no worry, no panic. Every loss, the fans and media tend to freak out. As a player… you don't press the panic button."

As for his role on the team, management indicated they expect him to come in as a late inning reliever. "But, I'll have to prove it," he said.

When he does finally get to Toronto, Schwimer hopes to add one other element to his role as a Blue Jay. It was something he had hoped to do in Philly, but it just didn't work out. He had approached Jewish organizations, indicating he was available to speak to young people and "help out in any way I can. I love speaking to kids and sharing my experiences and helping them get on the right path."

A native of Fairfax, Va., Schwimer attended weekly Hebrew school and had a bar mitzvah. An all-round athlete who won all sorts of accolades for baseball, he was also an all-star high school basketball player.

He has great memories of competing in the JCC Maccabi Games, an event that attracts top high school-aged players from Canada, the United States, Israel and other nations.

He participated in three of the summer games, winning two gold medals in basketball.

"It was an absolute blast," he recalled. "We had so much fun."

In his senior year in high school, he averaged 21 points, eight rebounds, and six assists per game. He was such an accomplished athlete, he was offered Division 1 scholarships to play football, basketball, and baseball. Duke and Louisville offered him full basketball scholarships.

Instead he chose baseball and was drafted in the 14th round in 2008 by the Phillies. He toiled in the minor leagues until 2011, when he made his Major League debut.

When it comes to pitching, he can't be pigeonholed. "No one pitches like me," he said. "I have an unorthodox, unique motion that helps me hide the ball better. I have better deception and create better angles so I can drive the ball downhill."

His best pitches are the fastball, change up, sinker and slider.

Vaughan relay event to fight cancer

Compiled by CJN Staff

Thornhill resident Vicky Wylson-Sher has started the first-ever Vaughan Relay for Life, taking place June 14 and 15 on the Woodbridge Fairgrounds at 100 Porter St.

Along with co-chair Gloria Mantini-Cappello, Wylson-Sher is reaching out to all residents of Vaughan, including Thornhill, Woodbridge, Maple, Concord and Kleinburg, to help make the inaugural event a success. Funds raised at the relay will benefit the Canadian Cancer Society.

Wylson-Sher lost her husband to cancer in February, and it is in his memory that she's named her relay team, Eye on Jeff. The Relay for Life involves teams of 10 people who participate in an overnight, non-competitive relay. Participants take turns walking around a track. Teams pitch tents in a "Tent City," where team members can relax when they are not walking. The event takes place overnight because cancer never sleeps.

Participants will be treated to dinner, snacks, breakfast and entertainment provided by live bands. There will be activities for the whole family including arts and crafts, trampoline and a mini horse show for the kids, as well as kickboxing, Zumba, massages, manicures, karaoke, board games, trivia contests and a middle of the night, open air movie on a giant screen.

Wylson-Sher said the event was inspired by a quote from Anne Frank: "How wonderful that no one need wait a single moment to improve the world."

Participants can register at: http://convio.cancer.ca/site/TR/RelayForLife/RFL_ON_odd_?team_id=284191&pg=team&fr_id=13002.

Film charts Israel's relations with Iran before revolution

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israel's military attaché in Iran hugs an Iranian general and plants a kiss on his cheek.

The director as a baby with his mother in Tehran in 1978.

This is an image from Dan Shadur's Before the Revolution, one of the documentaries due to be screened at this month's Hot Docs film festival in Toronto.

The picture, taken in the late 1970s, is surreal in light of Iran's visceral hostility to Israel since the Islamic revolution in 1979. Prior to this political upheaval, Israel had diplomatic relations with Iran, a key Middle Eastern nation. But in its wake, Iran has turned into one of Israel's most bitter enemies.

Before the Revolution revisits the bygone era when Iran was Israel's closest ally in the Middle East. The 56-minute movie will be screened April 26 at 5 p.m. and April 27 at 6 p.m. at the TIFF Bell Lightbox theatre, and May 2 at 10:30 a.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum.

Shadur has a special interest in the topic because his Israeli parents lived in Iran during this period. In those days, thousands of Israelis were posted in Iran as diplomats, military attaches and trainers, businessmen and contractors.

To Israel, a nation fighting to break its regional isolation, Iran was of vital importance both strategically and economically.

In the film, Israelis who once resided in Iran recall their time there. Their memories are mostly positive, only turning sour when the revolution upends everything.

A security guard who worked at the Israeli Embassy fondly remembers when Israelis and Iranians showed up for a screening of Operation Entebbe on Israel's 30th anniversary in May 1978.

Israeli performer presents Yiddish concert

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Mendy Cahan, an Israeli performer, will be singing a program of Yiddish songs at his first-ever performance in Toronto, May 5.

The one-man show, For the Love of Yiddish, is dedicated to the memory of Gloria Morris, a former president of Friends of Yiddish and a member of Temple Sinai Congregation, two of the sponsors of the event.

Other sponsors include the committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, the ShaRna Foundation and the Morris family.

Cahan, a child of Holocaust survivors, is a multilingual singer, actor, writer, lecturer and storyteller, who was born and raised in Belgium.

He made aliyah as a young man and after graduating from Hebrew University, founded Yung Yiddish in 1993, a cultural organization initially dedicated to saving Yiddish books, but now pursues many additional forms of Yiddish cultural activism in Israel.

As well, Cahan lectures on Yiddish literature; performs with his band, Yiddish Express; and is founding director of the Vilnius Yiddish Institute in Vilnius, Lithuania.

In an interview from Israel, he described Yiddish as an amazing kaleidoscope of our development as a people during the last 1,000 years.

"The Yiddish language, as opposed to our Hebrew and Aramaic traditions, has created space for common people to express their own Jewish identity.

"That is how the incomparable Jewish humour, irony and drama have developed. Yiddish jokes, parables, songs and idioms are now an integral part of our Jewish heritage."

One learns much, he said, "by watching how a culture with no central body, and without ministries of education or culture, managed to survive, bloom and create – sometimes under extremely hard conditions – fuelled by an unequalled conviction of the need to transmit and educate. This could be the most powerful lesson of Yiddish sustainability."

He added, however, that the preservation of Yiddish in Israel is a difficult task. "For many years, Yiddish had the burden of keeping our Jewish memory and identity intact, and for keeping the longing for Israel alive.

"It is painful, then, to see that when we finally reached our homeland, Yiddish was discarded and nearly pushed in to the realm of forgetfulness."

But in the past 10 years, this has been changing, he said, "thanks in part to the incessant work of our Yung Yiddish volunteers. More and more youngsters are turning to us to learn.

"We are in dire need of support, though, and the Israeli government is slow in responding. We are supported mainly by private donors."

On the other hand, he said, Yiddish does have an active component of speakers and readers of the language. "So we have a lively public that seeks and enjoys our Yiddish events. The constant influx of immigrants and tourists keeps our work relevant and meaningful."

Cahan said performing here is special, "because Canada safeguarded a unique Yiddish tradition after the Holocaust. Peretz Miransky, Melekh Raviatch, Dora Wasserman, Y.Y. Segal, Rokhl Korn are just a few names that highlight the unique Canadian-Yiddish heritage. It is an honour to come and sing Yiddish."

For the Love of Yiddish, also with pianist Nina Shapilsky, will take place at Temple Sinai, 7:30 p.m. on May 5. For information or to purchase tickets, go to templesinai.net or call Marcie at 416-487-3281.

A co-dependent relationship

a woman sheepishly says that Israelis discovered disposable diapers there. Still another Israeli remembers when virtually every Israeli household in Tehran, even those of kibbutzniks, enjoyed the services of live-in maids.

Israelis earned good salaries in Iran, and when they returned to Israel, they were able to buy apartments without taking out mortgages.

The Shah, Iran's supreme ruler, respected Israel's military prowess, particularly after the Six Day War, and that was one of the reasons he cozied up to Israel.

It was a co-dependent relationship. The Israeli government bought Iranian oil, while Iran purchased Israeli weapons and munitions. Meanwhile, Israeli construction companies won myriad contracts to build dams, housing projects and so on.

"There was no problem being an Israeli in Iran," a woman says. But her husband infers that Israelis may not have been popular outside Tehran.

Israelis knew that the shah's regime was brutal, but they accepted the status quo. As one Israeli puts it, "We lived on a different planet [in Iran]."

The majority of Israelis believed that the Iranian army would put down the Islamic revolt, but many left Iran as anti-shah street demonstrations escalated. Some Israelis, however, remained optimistic, hoping against hope that the shah would prevail.

These hopes were dashed with the departure of the shah and the arrival in Iran of Ayatollah Khomeini, the spiritual leader of the Islamic revolution and an ardent opponent of Israel's existence.

In a final indignity, the PLO was handed the keys to the Israeli Embassy, ending a special era in Israeli-Iranian relations. Israelis left Iran with their tails between their legs, an Israeli observes in a telling comment.

Shadur's film, supplemented by file footage, tells this story skilfully and empathetically.

Dance company's new works explore ranges of intimacy

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Kaeja d'Dance – the Toronto-based contemporary dance company under the direction of husband and wife team Allen and Karen Kaeja – is premièring two new works next month.

A double bill, the show delivers two takes on intimacy. They are X-ODUS, choreographed by Allen and performed by an ensemble of five dancers, and Crave, a duet choreographed by Karen.

"Both pieces focus on... what intimacy means to us, for us and around us," Allen Kaeja says. "Karen is creating an incredibly poignant duet, very personal and depth driven. My piece is highly kinetic and very explosive.

"People are used to dance taking place on a stage in a very confined environment, and I'm breaking frame and leaving that space."

These cutting-edge works are both rooted in their take on solitude and the attempt to connect.

Kaeja says that as choreographers and artists it's important for them to know how to push boundaries, and to take themselves, as well as their audiences, to significant places that broaden the base of understanding.

Allen and Karen Kaeja [Zhenya Cerneacov photo]

"We are propelling dance forward in many different ways. For me, there are a number of different levels – the whole kinetic level, which is my 'elevation' work. It is highly dangerous.

"Whereas much of the risk in Karen's, it's not only her physical vocabulary, which is highly unique and original, but also the range of intimacy both physically and emotionally," he continues. "Karen's piece is about getting into the porous nature of the world inside the cell of a moment."

Kaeja says his catch phrase is, "To arrive, one has to leave," which he equates with the Jews leaving Egypt. His piece, X-ODUS, examines if leaving is an overriding command, forced expulsion, overwhelming desire, choice or happenstance, and how we leave in order to arrive where we are now. He says X-ODUS is ultimately about arriving, adding that the State of Israel wouldn't exist if the Jews hadn't left so many years ago.

He wants audiences to come away from the show with a deep experience of the multiple ranges of what intimacy means and what it can exude.

"So often if we ask someone what is intimacy to you... it would be holding hands, a hug or a deep conversation. But we are looking at intimacy within the framework of the concert, with a thousand definitions that the audience will reflect upon," Kaeja says. "In a sense it deepens their intimacy with their significant others."

Kaeja says the depth and range of intimacy in his own marriage has grown and evolved, so it is both a personal and universal experience, the couple feels.

Allen married Karen in 1989, and they founded the dance company in 1991. The couple has two daughters, Aniya, 19, and Mika, 14.

The Kaejas have created more than 140 stage works and 26 films, received commissions worldwide and toured more than 20 countries. They have published two books, and their films are in the permanent collections of the Museum of Modern Art in New York and Yad Vashem in Israel, and in a number of university libraries.

They will be touring their new works throughout North America.

X-ODUS and Crave run May 7 to 11 at Enwave Theatre as part of Harbourfront Centre's NextSteps dance series. For tickets, contact the Harbourfront Centre box office: 416-973-4000 or online at www.kaeja.org.

Musician records European-infused American folk music

Stan Simon

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Stan Simon is revisiting his younger self in the music on his first solo album, Escaping the Madhouse.

The 27-year-old Thornhill, Ont., native, who spent years performing with hard rock bands like Courtesy Blush, is recording his first solo album, which has him performing a different style: American folk sprinkled with the sounds of European folk.

"When I was in the other bands, I was always writing my own music," he said. "I always had ideas, and all these songs coming out."

Now, he's taking those songs, many of which he wrote when he was 18, and revisiting them.

Many of the feelings he wrote about at that age still apply, although he had to update some of them. "I'm much older now and not as filled with angst," he joked. "I made some revisions, but it's refreshing, like having a whole new repertoire of music."

Simon's music features him on the vocals, guitar and harmonica, as well as other musicians playing the clarinet, upright bass and drums. He's also working on a song that would incorporate an organ and a strings portion.

Hiring session musicians can get expensive, he said, so he improvised the drum sound on one track called the Firing Line by toe-tapping onto a guitar case with a microphone inside, while playing a shoebox with a drum-brush.

Once the album is done, he'll be heading out to the East Coast for a two-week tour, during which he'll also stop in Ottawa and Montreal. Simon described his past touring experience, including performing around Europe with Courtesy Blush, as a "whole bunch of guys in a hot van in the French Alps." This time, it's just him, his girlfriend, a guitar and a rental car.

"We're going to see a bunch of sights, probably stop in the highway at any cool sights," he said, "and I'm hoping to meet a lot of people."

He's already been networking with East Coast artists to find out the best venues for his type of music, although he said it's been hard for him as a Toronto artist with no fan base in the areas he's approaching.

But he's planning to make it happen, since he has heard that the East Coast is a friendly area for folk artists.

"Folk music on the East Coast of Canada is a really big thing," he said, adding that he's not going for the sake of making money – in fact, he may not even break even. "It's more to expose what I'm doing to people out there."

He's hoping he'll come back from the tour not only with experience performing his new music outside of Toronto, but also with inspiration for new songs. He said in the past, travel has always sparked his creativity.

He recalled spending a month and a half alone in Europe, visiting places all over the continent, but especially focusing on finding his roots through staying in cities like Warsaw, where his parents were born.

His family has played a big role in developing his musical style. Growing up, he said klezmer music would regularly fill his home, and during the High Holidays, his cousins would often introduce him to different musicians, and that helped fuel his love of European folk music from a young age.

He described European folk music as more instrumental than the American kind. "But American folk music, like Bob Dylan, teaches me to put a story to the music," he said, adding that his current sound focuses more on the American music, but some songs do have European influence.

Working as an independent artist, he's learned that there's a huge community of folk-music fans in Toronto, and using social media has also helped in promoting himself. He said the trick is to give consistent updates but not constant ones.

"If I have a show, I'll promote it, but I won't necessarily be doing it every day and making people feel like they're forced to see it," he said. "You'd be surprised how people react to that kind of thing."

When the album is released in June, listeners can pick it up in either CD or vinyl. Simon said he hopes people who hear the music will understand what he means by the title Escaping the Madhouse.

It's about finding something in your life you feel free doing and not always feeling trapped by expenses and work, he said. "If you have something that can free you from those things, even for a few moments, that's true freedom."

Life-altering decision

Dear Ella,

I've been seeing Mark for the last nine months and have fallen in love with him and his little boy. Mark is a little older than me, but we're on the same level in so many ways. Things are getting serious. We've talked about marriage, and his son Justin and I get along wonderfully. The three of us make a special family unit, and I would love to be Justin's step-mom.

One day, I mentioned something about how wonderful it will be when we can give Justin a little brother or sister. Mark sat back in his chair and stared at me. He took my hand and said, "I don't want any more children." It was like I was punched in the gut. I'm only 27 and I've always dreamed of having a child of my own. I want to be pregnant and feel a life growing inside me. I never imagined not having my own baby. Mark is 36 and he said now that Justin is in kindergarten, he can finally enjoy him. When Justin was a baby, he was always fighting with his ex and the baby was one of the reasons they divorced, and now he's quite content only seeing Justin every other weekend.

Ask Ella

By Ella Burakowski

I can't leave the two of them, I love them so much, but am I making a huge mistake making Mark's family my own?

Life-altering decision

Dear Life-altering decision,

This is not the kind of question you're going to find an answer to in an advice column. Life doesn't come with guarantees, and whatever your decision, you will have to live with it and hope to not have regrets.

Giving up the chance of having your own baby is life-altering. Have you thought of what would happen if you and Mark split in 10 years. I'm sorry to be negative, but given the statistics for divorce and Mark's track record, this isn't something to overlook. Chances are, to Justin you will always be his part-time step-mom. You don't see him enough to create the kind of bond you're looking for. Your relationship could change as he grows, but are you prepared to take that gamble? Although Justin and Mark are a huge part of your life, are they enough to fill the void of not having your own baby? Will you one day regret making the decision to not have a a baby of your own? When Justin says in anger, "You can't make me. You're not my real mother," will you be able to handle it? Will you mourn when you watch a mother in the park cradle or breast feed her infant? Fast forward 25 years, when all your friends are planning their kids' weddings, or 30 years when your friends are showing you pictures of their grandchildren. Will you regret your decision then?

You have a lot of soul-searching to do before you can make a pivotal decision like this. Think this through very carefully, and don't choose the easier answer. One road represents short-term pain, while the other may be forever pain. Don't talk Mark into a decision he will resent you for, and don't trick him in any way. (I'm sorry I'm even mentioning this, but it has been done before.)

At least you have the sense to be thinking this through. That's a huge step in the right direction. Talk to a counsellor, or maybe other childless step-moms. Whatever you decide, don't look back. You will not going in that direction any longer.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN, e-mail: ellacjn@gmail.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

End-of-life care options

A recent conversation I had with a geriatrician practising in Israel turned to national differences in end-of-life care. She confirmed something I knew: how difficult it is in Israel to discontinue a feeding tube, even if the substitute decision-maker felt it was indicated and it was supported by a living will.

Most Canadian health professionals realize that our laws allow for such a move but also recognize its emotional impact: it results in more personal and professional conflicts than a decision to not insert a tube at the outset.

Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

A National Post article, "New Brunswick hospitals latest to offer patients expanded end-of-life care options" (Nov. 8, 2012), focuses on an initiative to offer patients more choices about their end-of life-care, beyond the standard "do or do not resuscitate" policies that often don't address other important issues such as artificial nutrition and hydration (feeding tubes).

A New York Times editorial, "Care at the end of life (Nov. 24, 2012), said that with good advance care, "there is good evidence that... it can greatly increase the likelihood that patients will get the care they really want. And, as a secondary benefit, their choices may help reduce the cost of health care as well."

Advance-care planning is not new. There have been strong Canadian proponents of the "living will," a written document used for stating one's wishes and values for end-of-life care. Verbal instructions are also legally valid but harder to "prove." In Ontario, living wills are supported legislatively through the Health Care Consent Act, 1996.

According to the Times editorial, "many people sign living wills that specify the care they want as death nears, and powers of attorney that authorize relatives or trusted surrogates to make decisions if they become incapacitated."

A nationwide American project, Physician Orders for Life-Sustaining Treatment endeavours to ensure patients' wishes are followed and are not too vague for family members so that they are sure what a comatose patient would want.

The Times article states: "With these physician orders, the doctor, or in some states, a nurse practitioner or physician assistant, leads conversations with patients, family members and surrogates to determine whether a patient with advanced illness wants aggressive life-sustaining treatment, a limited intervention or simply palliative or hospice care."

With the transition toward more patient choices about end-of-life care beyond "do or do not rescuitate," a cautionary note must be raised. One has to avoid the risk of developing a "quick and cheap fix" – that is, relying on simple forms in which people select from a menu of categories of choices for their final phase of care. This process is likely to be too minimalist to capture the nuances and emotional complexities of expressing end-of-life wishes. My sense, after many years of such involvement, is that the most important part of the process is not a "form" that is filled out, but having the conversation in a robust manner with those who will be responsible for respecting your values and wishes and interpreting the potential treatments offered when you cannot.

Pre-planning one's future is never easy and can lead to unexpected and unwanted consequences if not done carefully. This personal responsibility must be supported by strong commitment through public policy that promotes education and training of those who ultimately will be responsible for this very human undertaking.

His previous book, Moments that Matter: Cases in Ethical Eldercare, follows his memoir, Brooklyn Beginnings: A Geriatrician's Odyssey. News of CJN's closure evokes outcry

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

There has been a community outcry over last week's surprise announcement of The CJN's impending closure, much of it online and from the young.

With a rallying cry of "Save the Canadian Jewish News!" a group calling itself "The Brain Trust" launched an Internet-based support site on April 24 – two days after CJN president Donald Carr announced that the print edition of the paper would cease June 20 – that has since garnered more than 3,000 digital signatures and 45,000 page views.

The site also asks readers for their ideas and opinions on the best ways to develop a viable plan to save the paper. As of Monday, the site had recorded "thousands" of suggestions from supporters, members of the group say.

"Save The CJN is a grassroots movement with a plan to keep the legacy of Canada's only independent Jewish newspaper publishing for many years to come. We are your voice and you are ours," reads the "about" blurb on the petition's website, which can be found at www.savethecjn.com.

Co-founded by two young professionals in Toronto – Rachel Singer, 29, a digital media specialist and journalist who started her photo-journalism career with The CJN, and Alana Kayfetz, director of strategic planning at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP)

To our readers

The outpouring of concern and the expressions of "support" that have arisen since our announcement of the closing of the print edition of The Canadian Jewish News are appreciated by the board of directors.

Notwithstanding that announcement, the board has continued to seek a way to produce a viable and sustainable print edition, as well as an enhanced Internet presence. What we have been doing has been validated substantially by the widespread public reaction.

We assure our readers, our advertisers and the community at large that we are continuing to work assiduously to find a way to preserve a print edition. The circumstances that drove our decision and our announcement remain unchanged. Therefore, we cannot yet know if our hopes and intentions will be fulfilled. However, among many other things, we intend to organize and mobilize those expressions of "support" into sufficient, actual and tangible assistance.

We will continue to strive for the desired result and we will report to you, our readers, on our progress.

Judge Fish Retires

OTTAWA — Morris Fish announced his retirement last week after more than 10 years on the Supreme Court of Canada. The Montreal-born Fish, 74, was a judge on the Quebec Court of Appeal for 14 years before he was named to the high court in 2003. He also spent 11 years as an editorial writer and staff reporter for the now-defunct Montreal Star before becoming a criminal lawyer. His retirement, effective Aug. 31, came as he approached the mandatory retirement age of 75 on Nov. 16.

WORLD

Rail Line Is Legal

PARIS — A French court ruled that Israel did not violate international law by building a light rail line in eastern Jerusalem. The March 22 ruling by the Versailles Court of Appeals came in response to a lawsuit filed in 2007 by the Palestine Liberation Organization and the France-Palestine Solaridité association against three French firms that took part in constructing the line. The plaintiffs claimed the firms were responsible for human rights and international law violations. The ruling said international treaties applied to Israel's occupation of lands captured in 1967 and that those conventions state that "the occupying power can and even must establish normal, public activity in the occupied territory." The judges ordered the plaintiffs pay a total of $117,000 in legal costs to the three firms: Veolia Transport, Alstom and Alstom Transport.

Dresden Gets Rabbi

BERLIN — The Jewish community of Dresden installed its first hometown rabbi since 1938. Rabbi Alexander Nachama, 29, was formally inaugurated last Shabbat by the new synagogue in Dresden, which is in eastern Germany. Dresden's Semper-Synagogue was destroyed during the Kristallnacht pogrom in 1938. The new synagogue was dedicated at the original site in 2001. Previously, Dresden was served by Rabbi Salomon Almekias-Siegl, who rotated between three communities before retiring in 2011. Rabbi Nachama, who also is a cantor, was ordained earlier this month in Erfurt after completing rabbinical studies at the Abraham Geiger College in Potsdam. His late paternal grandfather, Estrongo Nachama, survived Auschwitz and became chief cantor for Berlin's Jewish community. The rabbi's father, Andreas Nachama, is also a rabbi and serves as spiritual leader of Berlin's Hüttenweg synagogue.

Chaplaincy Services To Be Contracted Out

OTTAWA — The Correctional Service of Canada (CSC) is looking to contract out chaplaincy services for inmates of all faiths across the country.

After cuts to the federal chaplaincy program were announced by Public Safety Minister Vic Toews last year, Jewish leaders joined members of other faith groups to denounce Ottawa's plan to cancel funding for non-Christian prison chaplains in federal jails, after it decided not to renew the contracts of all part-time chaplains.

Vic Toews

The cuts took effect in March.

Out of 15,023 federal prisoners, 133 identified themselves as Jewish, according to 2012 statistics provided to The CJN by Toews' ministry. The CSC doesn't track Jewish inmates' requests for chaplaincy services.

Three of the part-time chaplains last year were Jewish. The ministry would not release their names.

However, the CSC recently said it sent out a request for proposals from private contractors to provide chaplaincy support to inmates as needed.

Lori Pothier, a spokesperson for CSC, said it's expected a contractor will be engaged sometime in the fall. "The request for proposal will be posted on the government electronic tendering site... www.merx.com," she added.

Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A new national Holocaust monument will be erected in front of the National War Museum in downtown Ottawa.

Tim Uppal, the minister of State for Democratic Reform, made the announcement at this year's National Holocaust Remembrance Day Ceremony, held April 23 at the Canadian War Museum

"It will face the War Museum and will be a focal point along the capital's ceremonial route," Uppal said of the monument, planned for the corner of Booth and Wellington streets, down the road from Parliament Hill.

"It will encourage people to reflect upon the events of the Holocaust... it will be a monument of hope, a lasting tribute to the victims of the Holocaust," Uppal said.

This year's ceremony commemorated the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. The monument is scheduled to be completed in 2015. No details of its design have been released.

Speaking on behalf of the government, Immigration Minister Jason Kenney addressed the hundreds of Holocaust survivors and their families, diplomats, dignitaries and representatives of both Jewish and non-Jewish organizations in attendance.

All Canadians have a duty to remember those who perished in the Shoah and honour the survivors who are still living, Kenney said.

Deeply heartening

From the editor's desk...

I had intended to use this space to call to readers' attention what I believe to be one of the most important books of the last many years: Moynihan's Moment, by Gil Troy. That discussion will be temporarily deferred.

In light of the announcement last week concerning The CJN, it would seem an odd omission, and rightly so, were I to avoid the subject.

There is no sugarcoating the announcement in any way. The atmosphere in the Toronto and Montreal offices last week was one of shivah.

The respective staffs in Toronto and Montreal were assembled last Monday morning. The president of The CJN, Don Carr, personally delivered the shocking news to the Toronto staff. Typical of Mr. Carr, it was the menschlich, honourable, courageous way to impart such bitter news. After he spoke with the Toronto staff, he spoke by telephone with the Montreal employees. One of the senior Toronto managers was with the Montreal team to answer their questions. It was a very difficult assignment for her, too.

Members of the board of directors made their melancholy decision based upon what they perceived to be compelling evidence that there was no financially viable way to sustain a print edition of The CJN. Thus, before all the assets were dissipated in vain efforts to make the paper financially viable, they decided to use the remaining assets to provide severance to the staff and wind up business affairs properly. This decision stands to the great credit of the directors. They acted in consort with hakarat hatov, acknowledging the good that others have done for you, one of the high values of our tradition.

But once the decision was made public, it quickly became apparent that the directors might not have had all the evidence before them.

Like a small fire carried by wind across parched timber, a veritable conflagration of distress and concern erupted across the territory of the paper's readership.

Telephones rang unceasingly each day of the week. Emails zipped through cyberspace with seemingly only one address: The CJN. It was impossible to quit the office each day without leaving behind a backlog of unopened emails.

Thousands of people communicated their upset and, it must be said, even their anger at the decision.

Each day, the swell of reaction combining lament and indignation rose to a higher level.

The reaction of our readers was deeply heartening and humbling. Especially gratifying, especially moving, was the response of younger readers. It had always been assumed that The CJN counted for very little among young adult readers.

Studies have shown that the under-40 age group is unwilling to pay for news. Thus, the logic flowed, they would also be unwilling to pay for The CJN. And thus, it was further assumed, this cohort of young adults cares very little for The CJN.

It appears, however, that the leap of logic connecting young adults' news buying habits to their news reading habits is flawed, at least as they relate to The CJN.

Of their own initiative, a group of young adults has gathered together and, using the instruments of their generation, i.e., social media, started a campaign to save The CJN.

They created the website: savethecjn.com

The words they posted on the site brought fresh, happier tears to the eyes of many of us at the paper.

"We refuse to give up on Canada's largest national Jewish independent news source. SAVE THE CJN is a grassroots young adult effort to save the Canadian Jewish News... We believe in this media brand and know in our hearts that a viable, multi-platform and kick-ass solution exists."

As of this writing, nearly 2,000 individuals had joined their campaign.

Some influential individuals in the community have doubted and even derided the reach and impact of The CJN. The grassroots and "ordinary" folk of Canadian Jewry, however, seem to hold a different view.

DJ Schneeweis, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, has referred to The CJN as the "communal town square.

"The CJN," Schneeweis wrote, "has always served as a shared space for the Jewish community of Canada to express and enrich itself and also to express and enrich its ties and connections to Israel."

With young adults in the vanguard, an appeal by CJN readers of all generations from places across Canada, and even from across the Jewish world, appears to have caught the ear and the heart of the directors. (See Don Carr's statement on page 1.)

There is a case to be made, our readers are clearly saying, for the continued presence of the print edition of The CJN that far outweighs the financial one alone. It emphasizes the importance of the paper in helping create, nurture and maintain a feeling of community. Our readers' outcry is truly compelling evidence of that, evidence that might have been missed before.

And we are so very moved and heartened by them.

Thank you. –MBD

WHEN CHEDER WAS SCHOOL

Education and learning has been the cornerstone of Jewish life in Ontario for more than a century. In the beginning, one-room cheders and Talmud Torahs provided the only formal instruction for Jewish youths. Pictured here is a cheder class in Oshawa, Ont., from 1925. This photograph and others like it from the collection of the Ontario Jewish Archives are on view in Being Jewish in Ontario: A Pictorial Exhibition at Barbara Frum Public Library in Toronto as part of Jewish Heritage Month. B'nai Brith audit finds antisemitism up

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The number of antisemitic incidents in Canada rose by 3.7 per cent in 2012, continuing a long-term trend beginning in 2003 and running with only small decreases ever since.

The finding was reported in the 2012 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, released last week by the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. According to the report, 1,345 instances of harassment, vandalism and violence were recorded by the league.

In 2003, only 584 incidents were recorded. "Since 2008, incidents have increased by 19 per cent," the audit reported.

Despite the overall surge in reported incidents, Canada remains relatively safe for Jews: only 13 of the 1,345 incidents were classified as violent in nature.

That contrasts with broader international developments in which Jews have experienced violent – even lethal – attacks. The 2012 audit is dedicated to the victims of the Toulouse school massacre in France last year. In that incident, an Islamic radical murdered a rabbi, his three- and six-year-old children and another eight-year-old.

"Over the last decade alone, Jewish Diaspora communities have been targeted by entities and individuals aligned with international terrorism in such places a Mumbai, Istanbul, Casablanca, Mombassa and Djerba, underlying a vulnerability that has forced synagogues and schools around the world, including Canada, to add special security arrangements to their list of communal obligations," the audit stated.

"It does not inspire confidence in the Canadian Jewish community to know that Tahawwur Hussain Rana – recently sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment by a U.S. court for providing material support to the terrorists who launched the 2008 Mumbai terrorist attacks – was a Canadian citizen from Montreal," the audit added.

The audit reported "an unprecedented increase in incidents by perpetrators self-identifying as Muslims supportive of Islamist anti-Jewish sentiments – up from 16 in 2011 to 87 in 2012. No other ethnic or religious group came anywhere near this number in the lineup of perpetrators identified by religious or ethnic group."

Referring to these developments, B'nai Brith Canada CEO Frank Dimant said, "We are particularly concerned about this year's findings of increased participation in these incidents by perpetrators self-identifying as Muslims who are apparently supportive of Islamist ideologies of hate and violence. But we are encouraged by the many Muslims with whom we work closely, who are prepared to expose antisemitism in their community."

"The audit shows an overall decrease in vandalism and violence, but an increase of 10.6 per cent in incidents of harassment. Jews were targeted in their homes and at their workplaces, on their way to synagogue or returning from school. The language has moved from 'F…k the Jews' to 'Kill the Jews,' with Holocaust denial cases soaring by 77 per cent and threats becoming more ugly, explicit and open.

"The league is also warning that youth culture is being infiltrated by the lyrics of hate, extremism from abroad through online propaganda, and cyber-bullying directed to a victim's smartphone," he stated.

One piece of good news in the report: incidents of antisemitism on university campuses dropped by 30 per cent in 2012 from the year before, from 113 cases to 79. Only one of the incidents was categorized as violent.

B'nai Brith called for an action plan to address growing antisemitism, suggesting reform of the Criminal Code's anti-hate sections to compensate for the expected repeal of a section of the Canadian Human Rights Act that addresses Internet hate.

COLD CASH: Jerry Grammer, left, treasurer of the Beth Tzedec Men's Club, presents a cheque for $1,000 to support the Out Of the Cold program to Randy Spiegel, executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation. Bone marrow drive planned for Birthright guide

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Canadian alumni of Birthright Israel may have an especially personal reason to take part in bone marrow registries being held in the Toronto area April 28 and May 5.

Guy Bar Yosef – a 39-year-old Israeli husband and father of five young children, who served as a guide to many Canadian Birthright participants – is suffering from lymphoma, and needs a bone marrow transplant.

The drive for him will also help others like Jayden Roll, 4, Sarah Watkin, 5, and Idan Goldshmid, 18 months, who, like Bar Yosef, are waiting for life-saving transplants, said Nathaniel Haeems, a Birthright alumnus and one of the organizers of the drive.

Guy Bar Yosef and three of his five children

Anyone from 18 to 60 can register as a donor. Testing involves only a cheek swab.

Bar Yosef's best chance of finding a match lies with donors of similar genetic ancestry, particularly those of eastern European descent, according to a Facebook event page.

The organizing team includes Haeems and fellow volunteers Ryan Levey and Marla Pilpel, Marla's brother Shayne Pilpel, who works for Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation in Florida, and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Haeems, an Oakville-based management consultant who led seven Birthright trips, told The CJN April 24 that Bar Yosef was in hospital recovering from pneumonia, but that his spirits were high and he was "thankful for all the support… He has asked us to pray for him."

He added, "Guy's such a wonderful person… He's got a can-do attitude, he's always happy, always smiling."

Bar Yosef, the son of an American mother who (himself) became more religious over the years, connected to participants in part because of his background and resulting understanding of the North American Jewish community, including its broad spectrum of observance, Haeems said.

Other drives have taken place in Baltimore and California, he added.

The first drive will take place April 28 from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, 9600 Bathurst St. in Vaughan, Ont., in conjunction with the 7th Annual Hoops 4 Israel basketball tournament.

The second will be held May 5, from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., at the Prosserman JCC, 4588 Bathurst St.

Donations to fund cheek swab testing can be sent to Gift of Life Bone Marrow Foundation, 800 Yamato Road, Ste. 101, Boca Raton, Fla. 33431. The foundation can be reached by phone at 1-800-9MARROW.

More Syrian inhumanity

The Israeli military last week stated that Syria's brutish president, Bashar Assad, used chemical weapons against his own people on March 19 (Please see According to Reports, page 19).

"To the best of our understanding, the [Syrian] regime used lethal chemical weapons," Brig.-Gen. Itai Brun, head of the research and analysis division at the IDF Military Intelligence Directorate, told a security conference April 20. Brun believes Assad's troops had used sarin gas, a nerve agent that cripples the respiratory system. It is vastly more toxic than cyanide, which international convention considers a weapon of mass destruction.

According to Brun, there are more than 1,000 tons of chemical weapons in Syria, some of which, such as sarin, can be deployed from artillery rounds and long-range ballistic missiles.

The images of Assad's victims from the sarin gas attack in Khan el Asal in the province of Aleppo last March were especially horrific (as if other scenes of mass or single killing are somehow less). Their pupils were enlarged, their mouths disgorging foam. The pictures showed the monstrous agony of their excruciatingly painful last moments of life, gasping for breath they could not find.

Thus, to the grotesque heap of the dead and slaughtered in Syria's civil war, said to total more than 70,000, Assad has added a layer of inhumanity that was not so long ago thought by most experts to be even too much for him.

How wrong those experts were.

Last Friday, U.S. President Barack Obama reiterated American policy regarding the use of chemical weapons in Syria's war.

"For the Syrian government to utilize chemical weapons on its people crosses a line that will change my calculus and how the United States approaches these issues," the president said. His defence secretary, Chuck Hagel, said much the same thing four days earlier while visiting Israel.

But it appears that Washington wants to study the situation at greater length before it decides whether Assad has indeed crossed that line. The administration is worried that it might be compelled to match deed to rhetoric. The concern was made more acute by the assessment on the weekend by Britain's chief of defence staff, Gen. David Richards, who warned that a full-scale military response would be required to protect Syria's people from Syria's ruler.

Israel, however, does not need more time to draw the appropriate conclusions about Assad's use of chemical weapons.

If, in the multi-party fighting and chaos that now is Syria, chemical weapons find their way to any forces hostile to Israel, the Jewish state will act. The entire West, not just Israel, should try to prevent these weapons from falling into the wrong hands.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli president Chaim Herzog told Palestinian Arabs that their opposition to Israel over the previous 40 years had brought them nothing but bloodshed, misery and frustration. He made the remarks on Israel Radio's Arabic service ahead of Israel's 40th birthday.

Closure announcement saddens readers

News of the closing of The CJN is very sad, indeed! My parents were avid readers of The CJN when I was growing up in London, Ont., and I have carried on the tradition for many years. The paper has been a fixture in our home and we came to look forward to delivery every Wednesday to allow us to catch up with local and national Jewish news. It will be missed greatly!

Fred Leitner
Thornhill, Ont.

I just found out that The CJN print edition will soon come to an end. How sad that a community newspaper that mirrors the opinions of everyone in the Jewish community will be no more. I felt you were always fair and balanced toward the Orthodox community. Being Jewish Canadians, our perspective is different than Americans (we are not as strident), and that was reflected in your paper. That tone will be missed. I hope to see you in a reconstituted digital format.

Rabbi Mordechai Bulua

It was with great sadness that I read CJN president Donald Carr's message to your readers that The CJN would cease publishing a printed edition as of June 20. Your paper has been an important and valuable source of information to the Jewish community about local and international events. In particular, your coverage of the State of Israel usually offered stories that were lacking in the daily press.

Bert Raphael
Thornhill, Ont.

I was saddened to read that The CJN has been discontinued. I looked forward to receiving it every week and being kept up to date on events in the Jewish community at home and abroad. I was impressed by the quality of the reporting and the diversity of the articles, especially in the last year.

I am shocked and saddened at the recent announcement of The CJN's decision to close. As a Jewish professional who has worked with congregations across Canada for the last 15 years, The CJN has been an essential resource for me. As a member of the Toronto Jewish community, I rely on The CJN to provide me with current happenings in the city, across the country and in Israel. Having access to articles written by some of the most articulate and knowledgeable rabbis and teachers in our community has enlightened and inspired me on a weekly basis.

At a recent meeting of the adult education committee at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto, we began to plan the adult education programs for 2013-14. Several committee members brought clippings from The CJN that provided us with vital information about possible programs and speakers. There is no other publication that meets the needs of the Canadian Jewish community.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

As a 45-year-old Jewish business owner in Montreal, I understand your decision to close if there are no other options. In fact, I am on the board of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools and its Bialik High School (JPPS/Bialik), which is also facing the trend of many Jewish institutions with declining enrolment, or in your case, ad sales. This is a horrible trend, and it scares me for the future. Your paper is a link to the Jewish community of Canada. It is through you that we see what is happening in other cities, not to mention our own! We need that link to continue, and it should be supported by the tens of millions of dollars that are donated annually to the various federations. Their main goal is to promote Judaism, but they have clearly failed here. Many of my friends would gladly pay to continue receiving your paper!

I want to express my sadness at the news that The CJN is ceasing to operate. I always looked forward to my paper and loved going through its pages. I especially loved all the holiday editions, with their lovely stories and mouth-watering recipes. I hope The CJN will find its way into the digital age (although, in my humble opinion, nothing replaces the feel of paper) and that I will be able to once again read its pages.

Just how antisemitic are British politicians?

Miriam Shaviv
The Times of Israel

Cruising down the highway in his Jaguar on Christmas day 2007, Nazir Ahmed was distracted. He had just read and sent a couple of text messages, and did not notice another car parked on the shoulder of the road. Crashing into it, he killed 28-year-old Martyn Gombar, who was reportedly drunk inside.

Some might say that Ahmed, who had been made a member of the House of Lords by then-prime minister Tony Blair in 1998, got off lightly, sentenced to just 12 weeks in jail for dangerous driving, and serving just 16 days. Not him. Last month, the Times of London uncovered a television interview he gave in his native Pakistan, in which he blamed his imprisonment on "my Jewish friends who own newspapers and TV channels."

The exposé hit the Jewish community at a particularly sensitive time. Since early 2013, not a month had gone by without an elected politician – or, in Ahmed's case, an appointed member of the House of Lords – making offensive remarks about Jews or Israelis.

So does the British political system have a problem with antisemitism? And if so, what can be done?

The recent spate of incidents began in January when Liberal Democrat MP David Ward, whose party is currently in government with the Conservatives, wrote on his website that he was "saddened that the Jews, who suffered unbelievable levels of persecution during the Holocaust... could be inflicting atrocities on Palestinians." The following month, Respect Party leader George Galloway walked out of a university debate when he discovered his opponent held Israeli citizenship.

Already in the pantheon were Labour MP Paul Flynn, who in late 2011 suggested that Matthew Gould, the United Kingdom's first Jewish ambassador to Israel, had "divided loyalties," and Aidan Burley, a Conservative MP who attended a Nazi-themed stag party. For years, the Jewish community has had a strained relationship with Baroness Jenny Tonge, another member of the House of Lords, who was censured by the Liberal Democrats after she suggested the Israel Defence Forces investigate allegations it harvested organs in Haiti after the 2010 earthquake.

But while British experts do not deny there is a problem, they urge a nuanced response.

"The tendency is to throw all these incidents together as if they are all the same," says Antony Lerman, the former director of the Institute for Jewish Policy Research. "The immediate response is that they are antisemitic, but I question that. Some of them may be, but we can't link them so easily."

Mark Gardner, director of communications at the Community Security Trust, which monitors British antisemitism and provides security services for Anglo-Jewry, agrees.

"The headlines make it look bad, but we have to take each one on its individual merits," he says. "Some are motivated by anti-Israel hatred, others by anti-Israel criticism. Some have been dealt with properly, others have not."

While everyone accepts that Ahmed's comments were antisemitic, for example, Lerman considers Ward "ignorant about how to express his concerns about the Palestinians." Nazi stag-party guest Aidan Burley, meanwhile, who apologized to the Jewish community "for the offence that has been caused," did not make any anti-Jewish statements.

Both Lerman and Gardner agree that two points do broadly apply. The first is that almost all the figures are marginal, and do not represent the mainstreams of their parties. Even Galloway, who routinely grabs headlines, was expelled from Labour and had to set up his own tiny party, and none of the others are rising stars.

Nazir Ahmed

George Galloway

The second is that the political system as a whole takes Jewish concerns very seriously.

This is largely thanks to the All-Party Parliamentary Group Against Anti-Semitism, which includes MPs from across the political spectrum. In 2006, it conducted a major inquiry into the escalation in antisemitism in the United Kingdom since the second intifadah, producing 35 recommendations on how government, parliament and civil society could improve the reporting of antisemitic incidents, tackle antisemitism on campus and create better interfaith and inter-community relations.

According to Gardner, the report – which was later treated as a model by Canada – actually made a serious difference, giving the government a way to understand what was going on on the ground and support the Jewish community.

"It marked a real improvement from the previous scenario in which government departments lacked a coherent framework within which to hear, understand and cope with what was then a quite new phenomenon – the reality of which was still contested by some in the media and elsewhere," he says.

Both the Labour and Conservative governments produced responses, in 2007, 2008 and 2010, outlining their action plan and achievements, and the All-Parliamentary Group is currently following up with an inquiry into how political candidates address racism during election campaigns.

Many senior politicians, including ministers and the leader of the Opposition, Ed Miliband, who is Jewish, are also frequent guests at Jewish organizations' events, pledging support for the community.

Given this context, is the rambling of a few minor figures without much power or influence actually important?

There seems to be a consensus that it is, if only because their rhetoric on Israel – which seems to be the focus of most of the controversy – normalizes extreme positions and encourages irresponsible discourse. "It's less a systemic problem of antisemitism among political leaders, more about the debate around the Middle East and how this plays out," says Danny Stone, director of the All-Party Parliamentary Group Against Anti-Semitism.

He says that on the far left, the debate has already been radicalized by the availability of Middle Eastern channels on satellite television, which broadcast harsh rhetoric about the Jews from the Arab world to the West.

"If you don't like Israel or have a problem with Israeli policies, you start to get interested in that debate, and pick up and involve yourself in discourse where the language comes from a different context," he says. "I am wary of how that plays in civil society."

Jews in the constituencies of the offending MPs also have a problem, he adds.

"If your MP is saying things that are questionable, for example if you are a Jew in Galloway's constituency, it could be very worrying and unsettling."

But the parties have a mixed record when it comes to reacting to their own members' inflammatory behaviour. When Ahmed's Pakistani interview was exposed, the Labour Party suspended him the very same day. Prime Minister David Cameron fired Burley as an aide to the transport minister when it emerged that he had hired the Nazi costumes for the stag party, although he will still be allowed to stand for the Conservatives in the next election. The Liberal Democrats, meanwhile, reprimanded Ward when he accused "the Jews" of atrocities, but adjourned the disciplinary process against him even though he had gone on to suggest it was "the Jewish community" instead.

While the Liberal Democrats' reaction was "not the right way to deal with things," Stone says, he urges patience.

"It's a learning process," he says. "Not every party will get it right, and there have been senior members in the [Liberal Democrat] party who have spoken out."

The parties have come a long way in understanding the issues since the All-Party report in 2006, he adds – the key is to support and encourage those who do take action against offending MPs.

Whether the United Kingdom can ever rid itself entirely of such parliamentarians is doubtful. Their opinions reflect a strain of thought in wider society that is unlikely to disappear soon. In addition, their views on Jews and the Middle East may not become clear until long after they have joined Parliament.

It is hard to tackle antisemitism, in the political system and elsewhere, when what constitutes antisemitism is unclear. The fuzziness is around Israel: at what point does political condemnation of Zionism turn into something more sinister? Are attacks on the Jewish state the same as attacks on the Jewish People?

Sarah Cardaun, a teaching fellow at the Middle East program at King's College, London, says that "tolerance, multiculturalism and respect for different minorities is deeply ingrained" in British society, which will immediately pounce on anything perceived as classically antisemitic, that is to do with race or religion. That is why, she says, Galloway was so roundly condemned for walking out on his Israeli counterpart during a debate.

"It was seen as racism, which is a key word. Everyone is uncomfortable with racism, there's no controversy."

By contrast the "new antisemitism," which manifests as opposition to Israel, is difficult to tackle without being accused of trying to shut down debate on the conflict.

How then should the Jewish community react when a politician makes comments about Israel or Jews some find offensive? Firmly, everyone seems to agree – if the case is proven.

"Calling someone an antisemite is the political and legal point of no return, and is not something we do often at all," says Gardner. "We must use it with great care and be able to fiercely defend each occasion we've actually used it."

Be wary of Christians wearing kippahs

According to the March 24 issue of the New York Times Magazine, in the article titled "Oy Vey, Christian Soldiers," Christian bar mitzvah ceremonies and seders are taking hold in fundamentalist evangelical circles.

It just goes to show that even at my age, I have not heard it all. But Christian bar mitzvahs? They outshine (if that is the right word) even Christian seders.

According to a Pastor Brian Lewis and his wife – both charismatic, speaking-in-tongues Christians – this is a trend that harkens back to biblical times. Hence they use the ceremonies to mimic their attachment to a Jewish rite. They also note that Jews who are saved will be resurrected to eternal life. The rest of us? Not so much. See Dante's Inferno.

Another pastoral family had their son study Hebrew with a "Messianic friend of the family," and at his "bar mitzvah" the boy wore a tallit and recited the Shema. What's next? Chopped liver statues of the bar mitzvah boy?

Of course the ultimate goal of all of this flurry of Jewish copy-cat behaviour is the deeply held belief that Israel is the beginning of the redemption – theirs, not ours – and that when Jews all return to Israel, the end of days will be at hand. Oh, and we will have to become practising Christians.

This is not dialogue. This is Christian triumphalism.

Also cited in the article, a rabbi notes that Christians are not only holding seders but are being married under a chupah, and some are wearing tallits over their clothes. Christians are buying kippot and shofarot in Israel, and generally building on the exterior trappings of Judaism. Pastor John Hagee, for example, offeres a CD sermon "The Mystery of the Prayer Shawl." For $49 you can purchase your very own. Made in Israel!

Years ago, as program director at our local Hillel I was asked by the Christian chaplaincy on the University of British Columbia (UBC) campus to assist in their planning of a seder just before Good Friday and Easter. I refused. They were confused. Was I not honoured to be asked to recreate Jesus' last Jewish ritual – aside, I guess, from being crucified, an honour later shared by Jewish rebels against Rome?

No, I was not. The seder, I replied nicely (I hope), is a ceremony commemorating the foundation story of Judaism. It's not up for appropriation into Christianity.

A member of "Rabbis Without Borders" – whatever that is – believes this takeover isn't a problem.

"It bothers me in my gut" another rabbi says, "but I have to take a step back." Back into a deep pit, maybe.

No, the seder's not for the taking, nor are bar and bat mitzvahs or the wearing of a tallit or a kippah – unless it's in a synagogue – nor any other part of Jewish ritual or ceremony.

The new fundamentalism in Christianity wants to hug us till we all go to Israel or convert and bring about the second coming. This is so scary that I cannot believe any observant Jew, rabbi, or even the biggest atheist at Yom Kippur services would agree to this creeping assimilation of our religion into a Judaic Christian mind-meld.

Yes, these earnest people are great supporters of Israel. Yes, they send money and lobby on behalf of the state. But what happens when, in a few years, Jews consistently and stubbornly refuse to cluster in Israel, but continue to live in Diaspora? What happens when we continue to say "No thanks" when pressed to convert?

I have for a long time maintained that we can say nicely "Thanks for your support, but we will remain who we are." Period. We should view with distrust the embrace of apocalyptic Christianity as it applies to Jews and Judaism.

One final story: Years ago during a recrudescence of Jews for Jesus, a speaker at UBC invited Jews to hear his pitch. He started out very empathetic. As we began to take issue with him, he dropped his guard. In an instant he fell back on all the old canards about our refusal to recognize the truth. It took less than one hour.

Let's stay out of Christianity's theology. Let them leave our ceremonies – for us.

If pressed, let's explain carefully what is ours and why. That will be a dialogue that really counts.

Compromise or sellout at the Kotel?

I respect Natan Sharansky. How could anyone not? He represents a generation of freedom seekers, of those who fought for their religious and ethnic freedom in the Soviet Union. He and Ida Nudel were our heroes. It seems perfectly appropriate for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to call on him to settle the longstanding confrontation between diverse groups at the Western Wall.

Sharansky, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, proposed a compromise, not all the details of which are known, but there are many factors and stakeholders involved. The initial reaction is positive; it is even being hailed as a "Solomonic solution."

To me, it feels like a sellout.

The plan calls for a third section of the Western Wall to be opened where egalitarian prayer groups might function. It would be located at the archeological site called Robinson's Arch. Within this new section, all pluralist forms of Jewish religious expression could be practised. The plaza area of the Kotel would be reassigned so that army ceremonies might again be held there.

The Women of the Wall (WOW) seem pleased by certain provisions of the plan. Finally someone in the government is taking their distress seriously. After many years of quiet monthly services, the situation deteriorated, and women were hassled and arrested. Anat Hoffman was strip-searched. A Jewish woman was strip-searched by Israeli police for the crime of praying with a tallit at the Western Wall!

After years of neglect and disinterest, WOW gained national and international recognition. Moreover, the prime minister appointed a serious representative to come up with a plan, and he did.

The Reform and Conservative movements in Israel have welcomed the plan, because it finally breaks the unilateral and absolute haredi Orthodox hold on all of religious practise in Israel. It is a toehold perhaps, but an opening nonetheless.

Even the local rabbi appointed over the heritage area, Shmuel Rabinovitz, noted that he would not oppose such a third section. In North America, there was pronounced approval from Reform and Conservative communities and also, interestingly, from modern Orthodox organizations and leaders.

If all parties agree in Israel, there will be a great easing of tension around this very visible religious site. It will look as though the Netanyahu government can settle contentious issues. It will appear that the Jewish People can agree to different practices, and the Kotel is a unifier of sorts. One national monument where diversity is respected. WOW (pun intended)!

So why do I feel like this is a sellout?

We never needed a legal case for prayer at Robinson's Arch. The struggle for the Kotel was specifically for women to pray with Torah, tallit and voice in the women's section at the Kotel itself. We maintained our halachic right to pray with the rituals of our tradition, and we documented that in Jewish legal sources.

Sharansky has taken that entire encounter away. With one compromise, he has relegated us to a Conservative or Reform camp. But some of us in this pluralist group are Orthodox, and we have been compromised out. I don't pray in a mixed community. I am Orthodox. Have I lost my place completely in WOW?

Norma Baumel Joseph
in Montreal

I must admit that I have not been to Israel to pray with the group since its inception. By virtue of that I have relinquished my right to complain. (I was a participant at the first women's prayer service at the Kotel in 1988, and I supported the legal case that went to the Israeli Supreme Court, 1989-2002). But I can say that this compromise eliminates WOW's assertion of pluralism. It eliminates the future participation of Orthodox women and any claim for halachah.

Furthermore, I don't understand how so many modern Orthodox leaders and organizations don't recognize this as a sellout. For me, it's a complete abandonment of any form of Orthodoxy that is not haredi.

Reading carefully between the lines, one can see that for everyone involved, Orthodox from now on means haredi in Israel. The Orthodox will have two-thirds of the Kotel, and the rest of the Jews will have this third area, the egalitarian mixed one third. By this compromise, by hailing it and welcoming it, all these Jews have acknowledged that Orthodox means right-wing haredi. No room for women's greater ritual participation. No room for diverse halachic interpretation. One rule – haredi Orthodoxy – to guide them all.

Germany's first female German-born rabbi since the Nazi era

Rabbi Antje Yael Deusel found out she was Jewish when she was 16.

"It was a cultural shock for me," she said in an interview after conducting a Friday evening service in a synagogue in Bamberg, Germany. "But Judaism became an important part of my life."

To say the least.

Rabbi Deusel, who was born in Nuremberg and completed her rabbinical training at the Abraham Geiger College in Potsdam, discovered her Jewish roots by chance.

In 2011, she became the first German-born female to be ordained as a rabbi in Germany since the Nazi era.

Her predecessor, Regina Jonas, paved the way.

Born in Berlin in 1902, she studied with Rabbi Leo Baeck, a spiritual leader of the German Jewish community, and received her ordination as a Reform rabbi in 1935.

Unable to find a pulpit due to sexism, she worked as a chaplain in Jewish institutions. In 1942, she was arrested by the Gestapo and deported to the Theresienstadt concentration camp, where she continued to work as a rabbi. In the autumn of 1944, she was murdered in Auschwitz-Birkenau. She was 42.

Sheldon Kirshner in Bamberg

Rabbi Deusel, 52, regards Rabbi Jonas as something of a role model. But unlike Rabbi Jonas, she was raised as a Christian, her partially Jewish mother having distanced herself from the Jewish component of her ancestry.

I interviewed Rabbi Deusel, a friendly and approachable person, in Bamberg, a quaint town of 70,000 inhabitants in southern Germany where she lives and works.

I met her one evening at Or Chaim, a synagogue where she has preached for the past two years, and which was daubed with antisemitic graffiti in 2011.

The service was attended by about 30 people, mostly immigrants from the former Soviet Union past the age of 40. There was also a tall young African man in the shul. "He comes regularly and asks me a lot of questions," she said.

Rabbi Deusel was hired by Or Chaim's president, Chaim Olmer, who died last year. Olmer worked with her when she was vice-president of Bamberg's Jewish community.

As a woman rabbi, she has had no problems from her congregants. One of them recently told her, "We regard you as our rabbi."

But Orthodox rabbis in Germany shy away from her. "They won't look at us or greet us," she said.

Rabbi Deusel's personal history is nothing if not complex.

While her mother was of partial Jewish ancestry, her father was a Catholic who had no interest in religion. To the best of her knowledge, her grandfather, a shoemaker, converted to Christianity to gain admittance into an antisemitic shoemaker's guild in Nuremberg, a centre of the Nazi movement in the 1930s and 1940s.

To this day, she cannot explain how her partially Jewish relatives managed to survive during the long night of Nazism.

Yet mixed-race families like hers were not that uncommon during the Third Reich, to the best of her knowledge. "They didn't talk about it," she said.

Rabbi Deusel studied medicine at the University of Erlangen and specialized in urology. Later, she took classes in pediatric urology at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem.

Having been vice-president of Bamberg's Jewish community for 12 years, she decided to become a rabbi, following a formal conversion to Judaism.

Apart from her rabbinical studies, she took an MA degree in Jewish studies, writing her thesis on circumcision. Last year, it was published as a book.

Rabbi Deusel's younger sister took a different path. "I don't know if she considers herself Jewish. She's a proud atheist, like my mother."

Strictly speaking, she was not the first female rabbi in postwar Germany.

Alina Treiger, a Ukrainian immigrant from Poltava born in 1979, was ordained in 2010 in a ceremony attended by Germany's president. She works primarily with Russian Jews in Oldenburg and in the adjacent town of Delmenhorst, but of late, she has been on maternity leave.

There are some 900 Jews in Bamberg – a mecca of architecturally historic buildings – and its suburbs. The majority are immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Settled by Jewish traders about 1,000 years ago, Bamberg was not always hospitable to Jews. Pogroms broke out in 1298 and again in 1348. From the 14th to the 17th centuries, Jews were merely tolerated.

Jewish settlement in Bamberg reached its apogee in the late 1880s, when 1,270 Jews, representing four per cent of the population, lived here.

The town's Moorish-style synagogue was burned to the ground during Kristallnacht in 1938. By that point, hundreds of Jews already had left Bamberg. In 1941, the remaining 300 Jews in Bamberg were deported to Riga, Izbica/Lublin, Theresienstadt and Auschwitz.

Jews returned to Bamberg after the war, resurrecting the community. But in 1965, neo-Nazi vandals desecrated 32 tombstones in the Jewish cemetery and defaced a monument connected with the Nazi destruction of Bamberg's synagogue.

In response to these crimes, 4,000 citizens took to the streets in a protest as heavy rain fell on Bamberg.

The mayor, Theodor Mathieu, expressed his revulsion over the attacks and ordered flags in Bamberg to be flown at half-mast. In another sign of solidarity with the Jewish community, the local newspaper offered a reward for the capture of the perpetrators.

Before tens of thousands of Soviet Jews poured into Germany after 1989, Bamberg was home to about 25 Jews, mainly from eastern Europe, said Rabbi Deusel.

Rabbi Deusel, who has lived with a partner for the last 20 years, holds a part-time position at Or Chaim, working two to four weekends per month. Her colleague, Cantor Arieh Rudolph, is employed on a full-time basis.

She hopes to obtain a permanent position as a rabbi, but is not hopeful. As she put it, "There are not many rabbinical positions in Germany."

In the meantime, she practises medicine in a private clinic, performs circumcisions as a mohel and teaches Judaism at the University of Bamberg.

It's a hectic life, but she enjoys it immensely.

Four friends come to aid of cancer patients

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A group of four friends are hoping their first major fundraising event will inject a bit of cheer into the lives of cancer patients at Toronto's Sunnybrook Hospital as they wait for chemotherapy treatments.

From November 2010 until February, Emma Tushinski, 21, was fighting a form of leukemia, which required several rounds of chemotherapy, as well as radiation treatment, bone-marrow biopsies and lumbar punctures. She was being treated at Sunnybrook's Odette Cancer Centre, and was astonished at how long patients had to sit while they waited to get treatment, and how emotionally draining that waiting could be.

"When you have such an intense thing happening to you, the waiting adds a lot of stress," she said.

Over the 2-1/2 years she spent undergoing treatment, Tushinski would read, knit and watch movies in the waiting room. "Anything to pass the time," she said.

When three of her friends heard that story, they decided to do something about it, forming the foundation for Project Art, a fundraiser set to run on May 9 at a marketplace gallery in the Burroughes Building on Queen Street West in Toronto.

Ben Cowley, Zac Cooper and Matt Cohen, all 22, are working with Tushinski to raise money for an art therapist, as well as additional distractions to keep patients occupied.

"There's a lot of research giving credence to art in the healing process," Cowley said, so combining their passion for art with Tushinski's experience was a no-brainer.

He said they're using a "full-circle idea," running an event that raises money through art sales to implement an art program at the Odette Cancer Centre. The hospital has determined the cost of a part-time art therapist or teacher would be about $30,000, and Cowley said the team has already surpassed that goal.

"It would cost a lot of money to set aside a room, but we were thinking one feasible idea is having portable art carts," he said, adding that perhaps in the future, they could set up a multimedia art room.

He said the group is projecting they'll rake in at least $50,000 for the centre, and perhaps up to $70,000 – a major accomplishment, especially considering none of the planners have had any experience planning this kind of event.

"I threw a party in Grade 12 once," Cowley joked, adding that the whole ordeal has been trial by fire, but he wouldn't change a thing. "We're naive in the best way. We're open to all ideas, open to talking to anyone and taking on any suggestions."

The money they've raised so far has come mostly from sponsors and donations, and they're anticipating selling more than 500 tickets at $60 a piece.

The marketplace gallery will feature artists who have a "young, electric and exciting feel," Cowley said, adding that most are young, but they do range in age, gender and race.

Most notably, he said, is Jimmy Chiale, a French abstract painter and "street artist." Adding Chiale to the lineup gave the event a sense of legitimacy, helping them to pick up steam and give them credibility to approach other big artists, Cowley explained.

"He's this cool, cultured, urban guy who makes awesome abstract art," he said. "We have directed who we talk to based on that."

They will also feature live painter Jess Gorlicky who will be performing her art at the event, which Cowley said should add excitement and generate a huge buzz.

Both Cowley and Cohen recently quit their jobs to focus on the event full time. Although Cowley called it overwhelming, he said it has also been extremely rewarding.

"On a personal level, it's great to do something for Emma," he said, "and I'm also getting a lot of skills – communication skills, learning how to run a big event."

Tushinski said she hopes that even being able to purchase iPads or other technology could help patients alleviate stress and stop them from focusing on being sick.

Although the event has yet to happen, both Cowley and Tushinski are already looking ahead toward next year.

"I know, next year we'll be so well equipped," he said. "We'll have so much knowledge on how to do it."

'My heart is broken'

– the site is the first step toward ensuring there's a "place at the table" for all Jewish voices in the community, Singer told The CJN.

She said she and Kayfetz were motivated by their love of the paper, as well as the knowledge that their peers all felt saddened and shocked at the news.

"The decision was sudden, and it just felt like the community wasn't consulted. We felt this decision [to close the paper] shouldn't be made by just a few people" at the board level, Singer said.

Despite declining revenue and a drop in subscriptions, both she and Kayfetz say there are many young Jewish professionals in the community whom they believe would read and subscribe to The CJN if it was marketed toward them.

"Save The CJN" logo created by online supporters of the paper

"It has a following of all ages. As a 29-year-old, I know the support is out there," Singer said. "We want our [Jewish] news to come from an unbiased, independent standpoint."

Asked what their plan is with regard to the Save The CJN campaign, Singer said she first wants to "unearth" the youthful following of the paper using viral marketing techniques.

Their next step, she said, will be to ensure that she and Kayfetz will represent the young professional Jewish community in any decision-making effort where plans for the rebirth or rebranding of the paper are discussed.

"We're collecting people with expertise and we want to be that voice at the table," she said. "It is our objective that an online business plan is put in place… a sustainable business plan, not just for 10 years, but forever."

Asked whether any financial backers are part of her group, Singer said that "people have come forward," but she said she would not offer any names until they are ready to make themselves known.

She added that many of her peers and supporters of the campaign are children of well-known leaders in the community, and they can't bear to see the paper disappear.

"We'll keep yelling until somebody listens. We won't stop until the voice of the young professionals is represented and heard."

Aside from the youthful outburst of support for the paper, others have also made their feelings known.

Numerous columns and blog posts by community leaders have come out forcefully in protest of the plan to shutter the paper.

In an April 25 blog post, Avrum Rosenzweig, president of Ve'ahavta, commented on the then-nascent movement to save the paper.

"Which way will this thing go? It's hard to say, but I will state [that] the support the newspaper is getting from individuals of all ages and backgrounds is magnificent. It's true you never know what you've got until it's gone."

Bernie Bellan, publisher of the Jewish Post and News in Winnipeg, wrote on the CJN's website that the closure of the paper would be "a great loss… not only to Torontonians, but Canadian Jews as a whole."

The hue and cry have not gone unnoticed by the paper's board of directors, and Carr issued a new statement on Monday that acknowledged the board's ongoing efforts to save The CJN.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), also lamented the news last week.

"The CJN was probably our most important platform to connect with our constituency and inform them of emerging issues or advise them on initiatives we were pursuing on the advocacy agenda," Fogel said. "Absent The CJN, it's going to create serious challenges for us to ensure an adequate level of awareness of what we do, how we do it and ways [people] can become more directly engaged in the advocacy process."

In Montreal, phone calls, emails and personal encounters have echoed sentiments in Toronto: disbelief has been quickly followed by such questions as, "What can we do? Who can we speak to? Who made this decision?"

Many are asking how dire The CJN's financial situation is, whether other options were considered and why the community wasn't told closure was being considered. Many cling to the hope that The CJN will return online.

"When I first got the disturbing news, I did not want to believe it," said Larry Rosenthal, a businessman who is active in a number of community groups.

"It is a loss to the community at large, and a more serious loss to the Jewish community… The crew at The CJN are professional and dedicated in reporting the local, national and international news. For many years, they supported the causes that mean so much to us."

"This is awful news," said writer Barry Lazar. "I wanted you to know how much I appreciated the work you have done over the years, week in and week out: solid, reliable writing and reporting. I looked forward to catching up on community news and info each week."

"My heart is broken," wrote Baruch Cohen, who at more than 90 years old, remains an active volunteer. "I am at a loss for words to hear The CJN is closing."

"The CJN has been a mainstay of our Shabbat reading for many years," wrote Seymour Mishkin, a physician.

"I want to express my sadness about The CJN's closure," wrote David Smajovits, who handles communications for Jewish National Fund. "I've literally grown up reading your articles every week."

"Say it ain't so…What can we, the public, do to reverse this decision?" asked retired insurance executive Hy Rissman. "Your reporting over the years kept our Jewish community so well informed."

"I think the whole community is in shock," wrote Shelley Lubiner Paris, a public relations consultant. "I can't believe this important paper will close."

"I am deeply shocked and can't really believe they would shut down The CJN," wrote Frederick Krantz, director of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

"I, and the community, are devastated at the news of The CJN closing," wrote Jennifer Shugar. "Every Wednesday, I snatch it from the mailbox and read it voraciously. This is a huge blow to all of us."

"There is no question the paper has a loyal following," Suburban and Jewish Tribune contributor Mike Cohen wrote on his blog. "This was obvious from the comments I received on my Twitter handle and Facebook when I posted the news of its demise. 'What can we do?' one person asked. 'How are Jewish organizations going to get their word out?' asked a local publicist."

Behind-the-scenes dialogue between interested parties with "serious deep pockets" to save the paper are proceeding apace, according to one highly placed source in the community who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Canada's Holocaust Monument looks nothing like those found in other nations.

Today, alone among Allied countries, Canada has no Holocaust memorial located in the nation's capital. The government of Canada is helping to see that this is not the case much longer.

The National Holocaust Monument will honour the memory of the millions of innocent victims of the Holocaust, and remind and educate people of all faiths of the causes and dangers of hatred and intolerance.

Please join the individuals, families and corporations who believe in this important project. Fundraiser to send underprivileged kids to camp

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

This year's Intercamp Classic, presented by Fred and Linda Waks, will take place on May 5 at the Powerade Centre in Brampton.

Males representing mostly Jewish camps from across Ontario will compete in either a softball or flag football tournament, while females will participate in a handball tournament.

More than 900 Jewish high school students, university students and young professionals will participate, and about 1,500 people from the community are expected to be in attendance.

From left are Arielle Kaplan, Corey Cott, Hayley Silvertown, Emma Leese and Brad Wishen, who participated in last year's Intercamp Classic fundraiser.

The teams will represent several camps, including Tamarack, Manitou, Timberlane, Winnebagoe, URJ George, White Pine, Wahanowin, Walden, Ramah, Northland, New Moon and Young Judaea (Shalom, Solelim, Biluim and Kadimah).

All proceeds will go toward the Kids in Camp (KIC) charity, which helps send underprivileged children to camps across the province.

"The physical, emotional and social skills that these kids develop at camp will be truly invaluable," said Josh Howard, who co-founded the tournament with Noah Sliwin.

Howard said he and Sliwin were passionate about camp when they were growing up and see the Intercamp Classic as "a fun way to bring camp people together to help support people in need."

All the players have had a similar camp experience, which has impacted who they are today, Howard said. "The event gives people the chance to reconnect with old campers and staff members. It gives people the opportunity to have a blast while displaying their camp pride and helping others."

By working together, "participants and fans alike can walk away feeling great about contributing to those less fortunate and providing them with a camp experience. Camp teaches confidence, self-esteem, perseverance, responsibility, respect and social skills in a way that is difficult to replicate elsewhere."

Last year, the event raised more than $120,000. This year, the goal is to raise $175,000, he said.

In addition to featuring a high level of competition among the players, the Intercamp Classic offers great food, music, inflatables, a silent auction and raffle prizes.

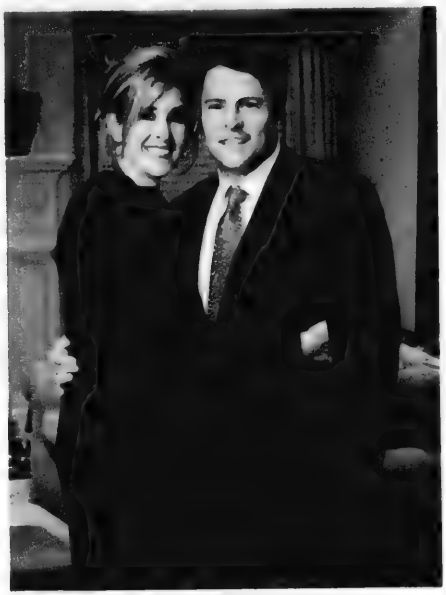
Ulpana and Or Chaim celebrate 40 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Bnei Akiva Schools will celebrate its 40th anniversary with a dinner May 8 at Terrace Banquet Hall.

The religious Zionist school, which has 200 students and almost 1,600 alumni, consists of Yeshivat Or Chaim, its high school for boys, and Ulpanot Orot, the counterpart for female students.

Community leader Saul Koschitzky was the driving force behind the creation of Or Chaim. According to a history of the school written by Suzanne Wintrob for the anniversary program booklet, he and his wife Mira were dissatisfied with the high school options available for modern Orthodox families at the time: either a co-ed Jewish high school, or a dormitory-style yeshiva. Their son David, now chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, was about to start high school at the time.



Marsha and Michael Lax, above, are being honoured as distinguished community leaders at Bnei Akiva Schools' 40th anniversary. Esther Berglas Guttman is being honoured as parent of the year.

Saul Koschitzky recalls in the article, "Our goal was not to create rabbis, but ba'al ha'batim who go to university, who stand on their own feet, and who have responsibility for klal Yisrael."

Or Chaim opened in 1973 with 29 students in Grades 10, 11 and 12. Two years later, the school moved to its current location on Almore Avenue, which was expanded in 2006.

Ulpana opened in 1974 in a house in Thornhill, Ont., with 23 students. Its development was also spurred by parents who wanted an alternative for their daughters. Ulpana has been in its current location on Canyon Avenue since 1976.

Michael Lax – who is chair of the school's board and with his wife Marsha is being honoured at the dinner as a distinguished community leader – told The CJN the school "has a major role to play in the community."

He mentioned, as examples, alumni Rabbi Rafi Lipner, founder of The House, a centre for young Jewish adults, and Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, JLIC director with Hillel of Greater Toronto, who both work with young adults in the broader Jewish community. Also, Lax noted, many alumni are involved in UJA.

About 25 per cent of graduates make aliyah, Lax added. As well, every year, three or four alumni of Or Chaim enter the IDF.

The school will enter a new era in September, when Rabbi Seth Grauer becomes Rosh Yeshiva/head of school.

Rabbi Grauer, who is currently assistant principal at Yeshiva University High School for Girls and associate rabbi at the Fifth Avenue Synagogue in Manhattan, is quoted in the dinner booklet as saying, "The feeling throughout the building is special.

"It will be my challenge to maintain that environment while also partnering with administrators and teachers to raise the level of professionalism and academic excellence and achievement... As we embark on our next 40 years, I look forward to helping Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot become stronger educational institutions and true models of excellence for Jewish day schools all across North America."

Moroccan director shares country's Jewish history

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"I strongly believe we can't just delete thousands of years of history," said filmmaker Kamal Hachkar.

Hachkar, a French citizen of Muslim Moroccan descent, has made a documentary film about a time when Jews and Berber Arabs in Morocco mingled and coexisted in apparent harmony.

Already screened in Morocco, Israel, the United States and several European countries, Tinghir-Jerusalem: Echoes from the Mellah is scheduled to be shown at Congregation Darchei Noam on May 5 at 7:30 p.m.

The one-and-a-half-hour film focuses on Jews who lived in the Atlas Mountains before their departure to Israel decades ago and their lives in Israel today.

Hachkar, whose Berber family hails from the town of Tinghir, will talk about his film via Skype.

"I wanted to make this movie to tell the story of the Jews who once lived in Tinghir," he said in an interview with The CJN. "It's a story that has never been told before. It fills a gap between the past and the present. Unfortunately, this part of history is not taught in schools in Morocco."

In 1940, one-third of Tinghir's population was Jewish, said Hachkar, who left the town with his father at the age of six months and has lived in France ever since.

"Today, there is not a single Jew living in Tinghir," he added. "The only memory we have of them are empty houses and tombstones in the Jewish cemetery."

In his film, Hachkar visits his hometown as well as Israel to discuss Tinghir's former Jewish community.

Kamal Hachkar

His grandparents knew Jews in Tinghir and told him about these relationships, he recalled.

Judging by his film, the Berbers in Tinghir have fond memories of the Jews, the last of whom left in 1964.

One elderly woman, however, points out that Jews and Muslims did not associate socially. "Everyone knew their place," she observes.

In Israel, Hachkar visits Kibbutz Neve Ur, Safed, Or Akiva and Haifa, where he meets Jews from Tinghir. They speak in a mixture of Arabic and Hebrew as they reminisce about the old days.

He wants to know why Jews left Morocco. Some say their immigration was religiously ordained. Still others think that the Arab-Israeli conflict drove them out of Morocco.

"A danger existed," a Jewish teacher said. Someone else remarks, "Jews were overtaken by history."

When Hachkar's film was screened at the Tangier Film Festival this past winter, Islamist and left-wing groups protested, claiming that he was promoting "normalization" with Israel.

Hachkar, however, was not expelled from the artists' union, nor was his film banned, as might have been the case in a country like Egypt or Jordan.

"Most of the people who have criticized my film haven't even seen it," he said. "People who saw the movie loved it and were moved by it. My film is actually an act of love to Morocco."

Hachkar, who has visited Israel 11 times since 2007, believes that Morocco's younger generation is interested in the Jewish dimension of its history.

Prior to the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948, Morocco was home to some 300,000 Jews, constituting the largest Jewish community in the Arab world.

But as tension between Israel and the Arab states worsened, more and more Jews left Morocco in fear of their safety.

Nonetheless, many Jews of Moroccan origin in Israel have refrained from cutting their ties with Morocco, he said.

Tinghir-Jerusalem, he disclosed, is due to be shown at the Tel Aviv Cinematheque on May 23 and then at Ben-Gurion University in Be'er Sheva before it is screened in Los Angeles in June.

Morocco could definitely play a role in Arab-Israeli peacemaking, as it did in the late 1970s, he said.

"My dream is to see a Palestinian state alongside Israel," he said, voicing support for a two-state solution.

Hachkar is currently working on a film about Moroccan Israelis who've visited their native cities in Morocco.

Did Assad cross chemical weapons red line?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Late last month, the range and pace of news coverage of dramatic North American terrorist-related events was overwhelming. First came the Boston Marathon bombings and reports of possible links to jihadists in Chechnya and Dagestan. Then came the arrest in Toronto and Montreal of suspects who allegedly were planning to attack a VIA Rail train, with reported links to an Al Qaeda cell based in Iran.

The intense focus on these stories overshadowed other important developments overseas. Still, there was one such development that managed to grab headlines.

On April 23, major Canadian media outlets carried an Associated Press story about a highly sensitive claim made by Brig.-Gen. Itai Brun, Israel's top intelligence analyst, at a security conference in Tel Aviv. Brun asserted that Syrian President Bashar Assad has used chemical weapons on several occasions over a number of months, including, allegedly, near Aleppo and Damascus on March 19.

Through analysis of images of the victims – who displayed shrunken pupils, foaming at the mouth, and other signs – Brun said that these symptoms "indicate, in our view, that lethal chemical weapons were used." Other Israeli analysts pointed out that Brun almost certainly had further evidence that he did not disclose publicly.

According to AP, Brun expressed deep concern about the international community's indifference to this matter and toward what could happen if chemical weapons fell into the hands of anti-Israel, jihadist elements. Brun estimates Syria's stockpiles of chemical weapons, one of the largest in the world, to be more than 1,000 metric tons and to consist of VX and sarin gas, both of which can be delivered by artillery shells and ballistic missiles.

In the Times of Israel, Mitch Ginsburg reported on three red lines that Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon outlined in reference to Syria. Speaking at a press conference on April 22 with visiting U.S. Defence Secretary Chuck Hagel, Ya'alon specified Israel's limits: the transfer of sophisticated weapons systems to rogue elements, the violation of Israel's sovereignty along the border and the rebels' acquisition of chemical weapons.

Ginsburg quoted Ya'alon: "We are ready to operate if any rogue element is going to put his hands [on chemical agents] or any chemical agents are going to be delivered to rogue elements in the region." (The principal "rogue element" of most concern to Israel is Hezbollah, with 50,000 missiles in Lebanon.)

Speaking of "red lines", it was U.S. President Barack Obama who stated last Aug. 20: "We cannot have a situation in which chemical or biological weapons are falling into the hands of the wrong people. We have been very clear to the Assad regime, but also to other players on the ground, that a red line for us is [if] we start seeing a whole bunch of weapons moving around or being utilized." He left the impression that if this line were crossed, the United States would respond militarily, at least to secure the weapons, even though the Americans have thus far avoided being drawn into the conflict in Syria.

It's because of Obama's explicit warning to Syria that Brun's revelation – which put Obama on the spot – was seen as a bombshell. The U.S. administration responded by saying that it's still awaiting definitive proof that chemical weapons had been used. In fact, the New York Times reported (on April 23) that Obama administration officials had in fact "pushed back" against the Israeli claim.

Bashar Assad

This response was led by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, who told reporters at a NATO meeting in Brussels on April 22 that, having talked to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that morning, "I think it is fair for me to say that he was not in a position to confirm" the intelligence claim.

As this column goes to press, speculation is rife about why, at a time of increasing U.S.-Israeli security co-operation, Israel and American assessments of the Syrian chemical weapons menace would have clashed openly. This may reflect just how high the stakes have risen.

Halifax celebrates Yom Ha'atzmaut

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — The joy of a huge birthday party filled the air in Halifax as more than 200 invited guests gathered to celebrate Israel's 65th anniversary of independence on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Longtime observers claimed the April 21 event at the Lord Nelson Hotel brought together the largest number in memory of non-Jewish dignitaries at a Jewish event in Halifax. Included were the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, J. J. Grant; politicians from all levels of government; members of the judiciary and high-ranking members of the military and law enforcement.

Hosted by the Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) and the consul general of Israel to Atlantic Canada, Joel Lion, the gala reception included a selection of Israeli wines and musical entertainment by Toronto-based, Israeli-born singer Daphna Tsur, who presented a 30-minute program of well-known Israeli songs and melodies that had many in the crowd dancing enthusiastically.

In brief remarks, Grant recalled his days in the military serving "on a peacekeeping force in the beautiful country of Israel."

Premier Darrell Dexter talked of his impressions after two visits to Israel, the last during a trade mission in 2011. Halifax Mayor Michael Savage spoke of two trips he made through Canadian Jewish Congress' auspices during his time as the Liberal MP from Dartmouth, N.S.

Canada's most senior military officer in the Atlantic area, Rear Admiral David Gardam, brought greetings on behalf of the Canadian forces, recalling the co-operation between Canada and Israel as HMCS Toronto and the Israeli navy were on manoeuvres.

Prior to speaking, Lion showed a brief black-and-white film of Israel's history and then discussed the on-going economic co-operation between Canada and Israel, with specific mention of Nova Scotia.

AJC president Michael Argand of Halifax thanked Lion and presented him with a Tom Forrestall print of Camp Kadimah. Lion visited the camp last summer.

Halifax rabbinical clergy participated as Rabbi Ari Eisenberg of Shaar Shalom Synagogue led the audience in the prayer for the State of Israel, followed by Rabbi Amram Macabbi of Beth Israel Synagogue, who blew the shofar.

In Fredericton, April 22, Marilyn Kaufman co-ordinated a committee that welcomed more than 60 people to Sgoolai Israel Synagogue. Among the speakers were Fredericton MP Keith Ashfield, federal minister of Ocean and Fisheries, and Daniel Soucy, New Brunswick minister of Secondary Education, Training and Labour. Michael Argand brought greetings from the AJC.

Lion addressed the audience, stressing the past and continued co-operation between Canada and Israel.

WOW! New UJA Federation initiative to transform supplementary education

By Daniel Horowitz

It's hard to imagine that in a community as strong and vibrant as Jewish Toronto, there are still some 20,000 school-aged children, between 4 and 17, who are not engaged in Jewish education.

Recognizing the opportunity – and the need - to engage these youngsters, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Education is spearheading a new, exciting and innovative project that will transform supplementary Jewish education across the Greater Toronto Area, and double the number of students in the next three years.

Representatives of the Centre for Jewish Education recently joined with two of Jewish Toronto's most committed and generous community leaders, siblings Harold Wolfe and Phyllis Flatt, to announce the launch of the new initiative called "WOW!" and based on the anticipation of this new program, "Wow!" is precisely the reaction expected from parents and students alike.

"When I was growing up, I attended supplementary school, cheder, as it was then known," explained Mr. Wolfe. "That education did not have much of an effect on me, however, I was fortunate to grow up in a family and in an environment where being Jewish was an important part of my life. My father took me to shul on Shabbat and all Jewish holidays; my mother observed the Shabbat. And we lived in a Jewish community, so I was very aware of being Jewish. But today, conditions are not the same. Even if a child attends Jewish day school, there are many competing influences that distract him or her from being aware of their Jewish heritage."

The WOW! project is a collaborative community initiative to engage greater numbers of children and families in satisfying and impactful supplementary Jewish educational experiences by enhancing what exists and expanding the range of program options to meet the needs of 21st century Jewish learners.

During the launch of the new initiative, the first four Toronto supplementary education beneficiaries were named: City Shul, Neshama Congregation of York Region, Torah High and PJ Library.

"With the generosity of the Wolfe and Flatt families, and a significant commitment from UJA Federation, we are supporting new programs downtown, in Thornhill Woods and beyond, that are going to transform our community over the next three to four years," said Ed Segalowitz, Executive Director, UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Education. "Soon, new options and programs will be available to introduce the joys of Jewish education to virtually half the young Jewish families across the GTA."

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is committed to sustaining and strengthening Jewish life in the GTA," added Craig Rimer, a board member of both UJA Federation and its Centre for Jewish Education Committee. "Our future depends on a community that embraces Jewish values, understands Jewish learning, and can confidently stand up and identify as Jewish. To this end, UJA Federation seeks to maximize the number of community members in our education system since we believe that, in providing meaningful Jewish educational experiences to our children, we can be secure that our children will identify as Jewish in the future. And, Jewish children grow up into future Jewish leaders."

For more information on the WOW! program, please call Chari Schwartz, Associate Director of UJA Federation's Centre for Jewish Education at 416.631.5823.

UJA's Walk with Israel 2013 just around the corner

It's hard to believe, but, as it's done for over 40 years, United Jewish Appeal's annual Walk with Israel is about to turn the streets of Toronto into a veritable sea of blue and white on Sunday, May 26th.

By raising money for the Walk with Israel, you are not only proudly declaring to the world-at-large your love of the people of Israel, you are helping to support those men, women and children.

*Funds raised through the Walk with Israel support a number of UJA's ongoing, transformative programs and initiatives throughout the Jewish state, including:

- Increasing social mobility and economic independence for poverty-stricken Ethiopian Israelis in Bat Yam through professional and vocational training in various lines of work, including nursing, early childhood education, bookkeeping and more.
- Higher education and programs for young people in Israel's southern region of Eilat/Eilot, including career development and teaching future generations about renewable energy and sustainable development.
- Urgent social welfare and educational projects for residents of the beleaguered city of Sderot, which has endured unprecedented rocket attacks over the past decade.

An estimated 10 - 15,000 participants are expected at this year's Walk with Israel

The Walk kick-off party, held at Coronation Park – across from the CNE's Princes' Gates and sponsored by Fabricland – will begin at 9am, with the Walk starting at 10am, rain or shine.

This year's Walk will be chaired by husband and wife teams Micki and Sam Mizrahi and Lauren and Jamie Wise.

"Getting involved with community work that is family-oriented is such a beautiful thing to do," said Micki. "This is a mitzvah project for our family and I love that our kids are involved in this," added the mother of two.

"My parents are remarkable role models for Jamie and I, and they are wonderful leaders in our Jewish community," enthused Lauren. "I have inherited the 'love of Israel' gene from them. Ever since I was a youngster, my parents have always taught me about Israel."

The title sponsor for this year's Walk with Israel is RIOCAN, Canada's renowned real estate investment trust.

"As Canada's largest R.E.I.T., RIOCAN is thrilled and excited to be the main sponsor of this year's Walk with Israel," said RIOCAN'S President and Chief Operating Officer, Fred Waks. "You'd be hard-pressed to name another annual event in Toronto which, without fail, attracts between 10,000 and 15,000 participants as does UJA's Walk with Israel," added Edward Sonshine, RIOCAN's Chief Executive Officer.

The Walk with Israel ends with the Renee & Irwin Nadal Festival which starts at 12:30pm at The Direct Energy Centre, Exhibition Place, and features carnival rides and games; a petting zoo; an Israeli arts and crafts centre; a kosher barbecue; and much more.

COR declares May kosher restaurant month

10% coupon aims to boost local eateries

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

Get set for a month of tasty dining at some of Toronto's finest kosher eateries.

Throughout May, to celebrate 60 years of kashrut supervision in the city by the Kashruth Council of Canada, which administers the COR hechsher, more than 30 kosher restaurants and take-out establishments in the GTA have joined forces with the council to offer "Kosher Restaurant Month," with savings of 10 per cent off their entire menus with a coupon available from the agency's website.

Kashruth Council spokesperson Richard Rabkin said that "there's nothing [the community and the council] want to see more than the success of its COR-certified establishments."

Participating eateries range from pizza shops to falafel and shawarma joints, and from frozen yogurt to fine dining.

Andrew Novak of Umami Sushi is happy to be joining in.

"It could be a good thing," said Novak. "All it takes is one new customer to become a regular, and you can make back the 10 per cent."

He hopes the promotion will reach people beyond the "frum [religious] community" and even "outside the Jewish community."

The Kashruth Council is advertising the promotion, and there's no charge to restaurants to participate.

"I don't know of any other such kosher promotions in other parts of the world," Rabkin said.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, executive director of the Montreal Vaad Ha'ir, which oversees the MK hechsher, called the month-long promotion a "fine idea, encouraging people to go out and eat in kosher restaurants."

As a COR-sponsored and COR-initiated promotion, only restaurants under Kashruth Council supervision are included. Moti Bensalmon of Badatz Toronto, another local kashrut agency, said that while promoting kosher is a good thing, the "big picture" question remains, "How do we lower the cost of the kosher food chain, starting with meat?"

This is especially true given the imminent demise of Chai Kosher Poultry.

Twenty years ago, kosher may have been the default for simchahs and family meals, said Bensalmon.

Today, it's more common for the meal to be non-kosher, with individual kosher plates provided. But that could change, he said. "Kosher food is just as good. There's no difference in taste, no difference in quality… People will go for kosher if the prices are competitive."

Bensalmon said more than 50 kosher establishments in Toronto have closed down over the last five years, "one after the other," including longtime favourites Marky's and Richman's Bakery.

But Rabkin said the problem extends beyond the kosher world: "The restaurant business is a difficult one… Statistics that we've read are that 90 per cent of [non-kosher] restaurants close within their first three years of operation."

That's why the Kashruth Council, a non-profit organization that doesn't receive funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is calling attention to its participating restaurants, twelve of which have opened within the last two years.

Reflecting on his agency's long history in Toronto, Rabkin said that from a "handful" of kosher restaurants only 15 years ago, his agency now certifies 162 local food service establishments, including restaurants, caterers, supermarkets, retirement residences and more.

But he said the community shouldn't take kosher restaurants for granted and urged Torontonians to "vote with your stomachs."

He added: "We should go out there and support our local kosher establishments so that they can thrive and be around for many years to come."

Edmonton's Jewish history comes back to life

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

Edmonton's Jewish community will soon have a platform through which to tell the story of its contribution to the city's development, when the historic jewelry and optometry store H.B. Kline reopens at Fort Edmonton's Capitol Theatre June 9.

Fort Edmonton, a park that showcases the living history of Edmonton, opened the Capitol Theatre movie and vaudeville house as one of its exhibits in 2011. It included the windows of Kline's store, which had been located at the theatre until the store closed in 1972. But beyond the windows, there was nothing else to be shown of the shop.

Ken Wasserman, the great-grandson of Herman B. Kline, was determined that more of the story be told. His great-grandfather's store was in business from 1904 to 1972, and it morphed from something akin to a pawnshop into a jewelry store. "I'm assuming by virtue of what was, in a mercantile sense, realistic at that time," he said.

Edmonton's Capitol Theatre in 1928

Wasserman, who calls Edmonton home, began collaborating with Debby Shoctor, archivist and executive director of the Jewish Archives and Historical Society of Edmonton and Northern Alberta (JAHSENA), to bring the store back to life.

"We want the store to serve as an interpretive space through which the story of Edmonton's Jewish pioneers can be told," Shoctor said. "The Capitol Theatre building was an integral part of the Jewish history of Edmonton, but no mention of our story was made in the interpretation of this site in 2011."

The building was constructed by the Allen brothers, two American Jews who built theatres throughout North America. On the left side of the theatre, the Pipe Shop, owned by the Ostry family, was in business for 30 years, while on the right sat H.B. Kline Jewelers, one of the city's first jewelry stores.

Recreating H.B. Kline Jewelers comes with a price tag of $70,000, and neither the City of Edmonton nor the Fort Edmonton Foundation has stepped up to contribute, although they have co-operated in other ways, Shoctor says. Instead, Edmonton's Jewish community will have to foot the bill. To date, the community has raised $52,000 and is appealing to the public for financial donations and donations of vintage jewelry, antique eyeglasses and 1920s-era crystal and silver that will stock the store's shelves.

Five antique clocks are among the donations that have come in so far, the gift of a local clock restorer who once worked for Kline's son, Irving. Another donor has offered to match all financial donations up to $10,000. Wasserman has also donated genuine heirloom articles from his family's collection.

"This will be a wonderful honour for my family," Wasserman said. "It's a foot in the door, a lens we can use to view the history of the Jewish pioneers in Edmonton. It will be a bona fide historical locale."

What's more, it's in a location that plays a crucial role in historical storytelling in Edmonton. Fort Edmonton Park is one of the city's premier tourist destinations and an educational attraction that receives more than 100,000 visitors each year.

"At present there is no museum for the Jewish community of Edmonton or anywhere in northern Alberta, nor is there an outreach method whereby our rich history can be told to the general public or to student groups," Shoctor said. "This project will satisfy that need."

The funding will allow furnishing and build-out of the 400-square-foot space and pay for an interpreter to be stationed inside the store, starting this summer, to tell the story of Edmonton's Jewish community.

JNF Ottawa gets new executive director

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Lynda Taller-Wakter has been appointed executive director of the Ottawa office of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Canada, which is responsible for the Atlantic Canada region as well as Ottawa.

An active community volunteer, the Ottawa native has spent most of her professional career in the financial services industry, predominantly in marketing.

Taller-Wakter's strong connection to JNF began when she was a youth. Her parents were involved with the organization and planted a grove of trees in Canada Forest. She has visited JNF projects in Israel and sat on the organization's Ottawa board of directors several years ago.

Lynda Taller-Wakter, the new executive director of Jewish National Fund's Ottawa office, plans to raise the organization's profile locally.

After having become involved with the Jewish Women's Renaissance Project, Taller-Wakter became more deeply involved with Israel and her local Jewish community. "It was my involvement with that group that prompted me to connect some dots from my past – volunteering in the Jewish community, marketing, going back to school… With this position [at JNF], I can consolidate all of my interests and channel them to a good cause, a Jewish cause, an Israel cause," Taller-Wakter said.

"I am very impressed by how much of an environmental NGO the JNF has become over time."

While completing an executive MBA at the University of Ottawa, she took a course on startups and considers the JNF to be a perfect example of an agricultural, as opposed to high-tech, startup. "If you think about startups – pioneers who are starting settlements from scratch, who are able to transform and distil into organic, multimillion dollar crops with the assistance of JNF water pipes, it is an incredible feat to witness."

The JNF has done environmental work in Israel for 111 years, but has been best known for planting trees. Taller-Wakter plans to raise the organization's profile locally and increase awareness of the various projects it undertakes. "It is our intention to have more events, to engage more people and to help people understand the work we do in Israel. I will be working with the board to see that we have a broader presence and are more recognized for the work we do in the community, and that people see the relevance of JNF and identify with the work we do," she said.

Josh Cooper, chief executive officer of JNF Canada, said, "We are thrilled to have Lynda as an integral part of JNF and know that her wealth of knowledge and experience in the non-profit sector will bring tremendous success to our Ottawa branch."

For more information about JNF, go to www.jnf.ca and www.jnfottawa.ca.

Kenney addresses ceremony

Calling the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising "a moment of extraordinary defiance," Kenney praised those who participated in it.

"Their acts of bravery echo through time down to us today. They say to us that hope, dignity and freedom can overcome death, despair and depravity," he said.

Now that Canada has assumed the chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA), it will lead the world in preserving the memory of the Shoah, he added.

"Canada will also continue to lead the way in isolating those who threaten the very existence of the State of Israel – the modern miracle that rose from the ashes of the Holocaust as the first and final refuge of the Jewish people," Kenney said.

The chair of IHRA, former Liberal MP Mario Silva, had just returned from a trip to Poland, where he participated in events commemorating the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising.

"I will focus on building partnerships with other international bodies… countries such as Ukraine where one-quarter of the Holocaust victims died," Silva said.

"In honour of the memory of the victims of the Holocaust, let us each renew today our commitment to fight antisemitism."

NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, Bloc Québécois MP M. Louis Plamondon and Green Party Leader Elizabeth May all echoed the message of remembrance and continuing the fight against intolerance and hatred.

York Centre Tory MP Mark Adler, the only MP who is the child of a Holocaust survivor, read a moving letter from a young girl to her mother whom she knew she would never see again.

Following remarks by Israeli Ambassador Miriam Ziv, six candles were lit, each by a group of survivors accompanied by parliamentarians and dignitaries.

The ceremony, organized and led by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem with the assistance of the Zachor Coalition, highlighted the theme "Defiance and Resistance," marking the 70th anniversary since the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, as well as 10 years since the Canadian government passed Bill C-459 establishing a national day to commemorate the Holocaust.

Canada, Israel strengthen scientific ties

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel continue to strengthen their ties in the science and technology sector.

In Toronto, Minister of Natural Resources Joe Oliver and Minister of State for Science and Technology Gary Goodyear last week put out a request for proposals under the newly created Canada–Israel Energy Science and Technology Fund (CIEST).

The fund will support "high-quality scientific research partnerships," a ministry statement says. "These collaborations will spur the development of innovative energy technologies and processes to enable the responsible development of unconventional oil and gas resources, including applications to address environmental challenges. They will also consider initiatives on other critical energy sources of interest to both countries."

This is a three-year initiative that will see Natural Resources Canada contribute $5 million to the new fund, with Israel providing funding "on a project-by-project basis."

The fund, announced last week, is administered by the Canada–Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), established in 1994 to "stimulate and invest" in collaborative research projects between the two countries.

Henri Rothschild, president of CIIRDF, said the fund will "identify Canada-Israel opportunities for research cooperation that apply Israeli world leadership in enabling technologies with Canadian expertise and the [overall] innovation needs of the energy sector."

According to Natural Resources Canada, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada will fund eligible Canadian academic components of selected CIEST projects "in partnership with Canadian industry through Collaborative Research and Development and Applied Research and Development grants."

Oliver left for Israel on Monday to meet with business leaders and government officials "to further explore trade and investment opportunities between the two countries," according to the ministry.

Prof. Daniel Hillel, the 2012 recipient of the World Food Prize, has advised and helped several of Israel's hostile neighbours. Hillel is optimistic that co-operation in areas such as water, agriculture and food delivery will break down barriers and build bridges between Israel and other Mideast countries. Hillel is seen here with Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada. To read story, go to cjnews.com.go

Couple still dancing after 70 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Pearl and David Viner met more than 70 years ago at a dance party at Club Esquire.

To mark the couple's 70th wedding anniversary on May 5, Earl Bales Seniors Club, where they are active members, is holding a dance in their honour.

"We have never stopped dancing," said Pearl, 87, in a recent interview at their North York apartment.

Pearl said that after the Club Esquire party, her girlfriend asked if she would like to see David, now 89, again. "'Sure,' I told her, 'he's a good dancer, especially the jitterbug.'"

When they were about to be married – they now have three children, four grandchildren and two great-grandchildren – their fathers had to come with them to City Hall. "We were too young to get married on our own," she said.

She rented her wedding gown for $7.50 and had to baste it on herself. "Two weeks later, my friend rented the same dress. That's how we did things back then."

Their wedding was at Beth Israel congregation, known as the Shaw Street Syngogue, and with the $98 they received in wedding gifts, they went to Niagara Falls for a three-day honeymoon.

"We spent $80. We didn't worry about money."

Pearl was a cashier and David worked in a machine shop when they got married, but one year later, David was sent overseas with the Air Force. Eventually, he went into the scrap metal business and Pearl stayed home with the children.

"No one can believe we're married 70 years," said Pearl. "We can't even believe it."

David said that it's a good thing they kept their marriage certificate. "We have proof," he said, laughing.

They've had a happy marriage, Pearl said. "Of course we have arguments, but we make up. David's mother died when he was 17, so my mother became his mother. He really became part of our family."

They've always tried to have fun, she said. "Once I dressed David up like Carmen Miranda for a party. He wore my hat, and I attached fruit to it. Unfortunately, the fruit had been frozen, so within a few hours he was melting everywhere.

"We've been lucky. We have a wonderful family, and we had close friends. Sadly, though, there aren't many people left. We don't know anyone married 70 years," she said.

Pearl and David Viner

For David's recent birthday, they had a party for him and their grandson who also celebrated a birthday, and they are going to celebrate their anniversary with their family. "These are the things that give us a boost," Pearl said.

She hopes they have been good role models for their children. "I hope they grow old the way we've grown old."

A Jewish approach to job cuts

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Competition is the lifeblood of capitalism. It's why countries negotiate free trade agreements, to remove artificial barriers to competition. These benefit the many, but there are always some people who are adversely affected, at least initially. Competition forces companies to become more efficient, yet such efficiency inevitably leads to job losses. While this may be the best economic approach, economic policy is only one of many factors that must be considered.

The Royal Bank was recently accused of firing 45 Canadian workers and replacing them with foreign workers. The bank denied this, noting that they were a supplier's employees. Instead of debating semantics as to whether the bank technically fired workers, and ignoring the political rhetoric, it behooves us to examine the issue of employment equity.

A similar issue has arisen with the Israeli government's announcement of its intent to pursue an "open skies" agreement with European airlines, something the government says will lower prices and boost tourism. The response has been a strike by the Israeli airlines and a threat by the Histadrut, the labour federation of Israel, to close down all air travel to and from Israel.

While balancing competing interests is never simple, some basic guidelines can help. Economist Milton Friedman famously pointed out that "the business of business is business," but Judaism sees business as a means to an end. It's the mechanism by which we're able to lead a moral life – self-supporting, helping others and partnering with God in the ongoing process of creation.

As a starting point, one should try to conduct business with those closest to us, with fellow Jews, and, presumably, one should buy a Canadian product before a foreign one. However, this applies only when doing so doesn't cause a financial loss, though it would seem a small loss is a fair price to pay for supporting those who share our values.

A company is well within its rights to try to increase profit, though here, too, profit is just one function, if admittedly the major one, of the many functions of a firm. It's difficult to know where to draw the line, but it appears reasonable that a company that's making money in line with its competitors should not replace workers just to make extra profit. However, if a division is losing money, it would be appropriate. Thus the approach of the Royal Bank to find other jobs for the affected workers seems reasonable, even if the new jobs aren't exactly the same and come a slight pay cut.

Governments must take a wider view, and any decision they make will affect many people. Clearly the role of government is to make decisions that benefit society as a whole and not back down in the face of industry pressure or lobbyists whose concern is the welfare of the few instead of the many. Unfortunately this is a task most governments have failed at, which goes a long way to explaining the financial crisis, especially in Europe.

"Open skies" is hopefully the first of many initiatives the new Israeli government will take that will benefit Israeli society as a whole.

Book on Rashi not only for scholars

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

An important new book on Rashi (Rabbi Solomon, the son of Isaac), the pre-eminent medieval Ashkenazic rabbi, is now available to English readers. The volume, titled Rashi, is Joel Linsider's translation of a 2006 Hebrew book by Avraham Grossman, one of the world's foremost scholars of medieval Judaica.

Translating a book like this is no mean feat, as it is filled with quotations from biblical, rabbinic and medieval Hebrew – some of them very difficult to understand – and the force of Grossman's arguments is often dependent on a close reading of these texts. Linsider has done a very capable job; his recent passing is an occasion for sadness in the world of Judaica publishing.

Before I began reading Rashi, I wondered whether Grossman would have anything new of value to say about Rashi (1040-1105). More books and articles have been written about Rashi than about any other pre-modern Jew, with the possible exception of Moses Maimonides. Yet serious gaps exist in our knowledge of Rashi's life. For example, it is reasonable to assume that his attitude to the Christians, among whom he lived in northern France, must have been strongly affected by the massacres during the First Crusade (1096) of the Jews of those German communities where he had studied in his youth. We know that Rashi remained active until close to his death in 1105. But we still don't know which books of his were written under the shadow of the Crusades in those last nine years of his life.

No ancient archive of documents about Rashi is revealed in this book. Rather, Grossman returns to Rashi's published writings, reading them very closely in an attempt to make Rashi come to life for 21st century readers.

Basing a character sketch on someone's writings is iffy. And when the major works of the author are works of commentary, as opposed to independent scholarship, the task is even more difficult. While Rashi was a prolific writer in many genres, the two largest and most significant works he produced were his commentaries on the Bible and the Babylonian Talmud. So when Rashi waxes eloquent in a commentary in praise of, for example, humility, does that mean that Rashi was promoting humility or that he was explaining that the Bible or Talmud did? This problem is complicated by the fact that in Rashi's most famous work, his Torah commentary, much of the prose (I'd estimate at least 80 per cent) is composed of direct quotations or light reworkings of the words of the Talmud and midrash collections that he drew upon. From Grossman's book, I learned that even Rashi's Talmud commentary is probably dependent on written Talmud notes of his predecessors and teachers, most of which are now lost, making it impossible to know how much of his commentary is original to Rashi.

In order to legitimate using Rashi's Bible commentary to reconstruct Rashi's worldview, Grossman also has to counter the position of Nechama Leibowitz (1905-1997), the grande dame of the modern study of classical Jewish Bible commentaries. Leibowitz taught generations of students, including me, that Rashi was more of a commentator than an educator. When reading any comment of Rashi on a biblical verse, Leibowitz taught, the most important question that the reader should ask is "Mah kasheh le-Rashi – what is bothering Rashi about the biblical text? What anomaly or difficulty did Rashi find in the text that underlies his comment?"

Grossman gently, respectfully and effectively refutes Leibowitz's approach, proving that, beyond identifying and solving difficulties in the biblical text, Rashi the pedagogue was pursuing various educational agendas. Thus, according to Grossman, Rashi's works can serve as tools for identifying his values.

For example, four times in his commentary to Deuteronomy (6:6, 11:13, 26:16 and 27:9), Rashi makes the same point – that the words of the Torah should be new in your eyes every day, as if you had just received it that day. In none of these four passages does the text demand such an explanation and in none does any insurmountable textual difficulty "require" Rashi to resort to that explanation. Grossman concludes, "Because of his powerful desire to teach people and to instil a particular idea into their hearts, Rashi repeated the same idea four times in one book. This is not exegesis so much as preaching."

In another example, in his commentary on the verse, "A lover of money never has his fill of money" (Ecclesiastes 5:9), Rashi quotes a midrash in praise of the study of Gemara. Grossman concludes, "The verse presents no difficulty warranting use of this midrash... It was Rashi's pedagogical agenda that moved him."

Grossman combs through Rashi's works and extracts points that, he argues, reflect Rashi's character and worldview. He paints a vivid picture of a humble yet self-confident man with a sense of mission, a man with a fierce dedication to and love for the Land of Israel and a strong antipathy to non-Jewish nations. He was fiercely committed to study and to his students, encouraging them to write their own works even while they were still studying.

While Grossman's research is impressive and most of his conclusions are compelling, some arguments are stronger than others. For example, as much as I wish that Rashi had been as pro-women's rights as Grossman suggests, I was not overwhelmed by the force of his proofs. Grossman's depiction of Rashi's humility, on the other hand, I found convincing and even moving. Serious students of traditional Bible commentaries know that Rashi often writes, "Eini yodea – I don't know," while most of the other traditional Bible commentators do not. It is inspiring to see how the most famous and accomplished Ashkenazi rabbi of all times was a man of almost unparallelled humility.

This and other points about Rashi are brought to life by Grossman, who teaches us that Rashi's "works contain consolation and encouragement no less than exegesis." Grossman's book, like the works of Rashi himself, can be read with profit and enjoyment both by scholars and amateurs.

CHW campaign launch aids breast cancer centres

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) recently hosted its annual campaign launch event, Hope & Inspiration.

The April 21 fundraiser was held at the Eglinton Grand in Toronto and featured guest speakers Dr. Tami Karni and Dr. Eileen Rakovitch.

Karni, a surgeon who is the medical director of CHW's M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute at Assaf Harofeh Medical Centre in Israel, talked about delivering the best possible patient care.

Rakovitch, the director of the new Louise Temerty Breast Cancer Centre at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto, discussed how patient care is evolving with new research, treatments and technologies.

The CHW event, which supports the rapid diagnosis and treatment of breast cancer, raised funds for an exam room at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre's new breast-cancer centre and an ultrasound unit at the CHW M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute in Israel.

Thanks to a generous donation from CHW, the M. Fanny Comprehensive Breast Care Institute opened in 2000, setting a new standard for patient care in Israel. Karni said staff from various medical backgrounds work together at the facility to offer a multi-disciplinary haven for cancer patients and their families.

In its first year of operation, the institute served 5,300 patients. In 2003, more than 12,000 patients were screened, and between 250 and 300 new patients were diagnosed with breast cancer. Today, within 24 to 48 hours after a woman's first visit to the institute, she is provided with a diagnosis and a followup plan. Karni said she is "incredibly proud" of how the centre has evolved and is eager to share her knowledge with other medical centres and hospitals.

She said the greatest reward of the institute is the warmth and appreciation the staff receives from the women they help.

"The most important thing is to give support to these women, to understand their suffering and to help them get through the disease," Karni said. "We see the growth that can come from the misery."

The evening also featured comedian Marla Lukofsky, a breast cancer survivor, and musical entertainer Ilana Waldston. For more information, visit www.chw.ca.

ET fundraiser planned

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

ET Toronto's second annual fundraiser, Shake it Up, is set for May 8 at St. Lawrence Hall.

Funds raised from the event will be donated to the Movement Disorders Clinic at Toronto Western Hospital, earmarked for awareness and research into essential tremor (ET), a life-altering condition, often inherited, that causes involuntary shaking of the hands, head and voice.

Miriam Freedman, 74, said she first became involved in the organization, which has 100 groups in the United States, when she read an article in a Florida newspaper.

"I called them, because since I was in my 20s, I noticed that my hand would shake, and sometimes, my head shakes without me realizing it."

ET, is disruptive, she said, but not life threatening. "It does make daily activities such as writing a letter, dressing and eating a source of frustration and embarrassment. It is a problem that we want to publicize."

The ET Toronto group, recently created by Cecilia Ronderos, who suffers with ET, is the first group in Canada, said Freedman. "Our meetings provide a valuable forum for people with ET to discuss their problems, understand the latest research and share strategies for coping with this disease."

The fundraiser features violinist Moshe Hammer, a soloist with the Calgary Philharmonic and Winnipeg Symphony Orchestra.

Group assists couples experiencing fertility issues

Reva Kaiser
Special to The CJN

In our Jewish culture, children are intrinsic to fundamental experiences and milestones.

They are valued members of our community, a focus of holiday traditions and markers of life-cycle events, from bris and bar/bat mitzvah, to wedding and beyond.

But for the couple that wishes to yet is unable to conceive, such celebratory events are instead aching reminders of the cavity in their life, a hollowness accompanied by isolation. Not only does a childless couple feel excluded by friends focused on their own growing families, but they often suffer alone.

After experiencing the anguish and tribulations of infertility, three Toronto couples, Pamela and Menachem Kuhl, Shaindy and Moti Seidenfeld, and Yona and Isser Elishis, decided that no one should face infertility without support.

And so, just over 10 years ago, Small Wonders was born. With a mandate of support, assistance and discretion, the Toronto organization assists Jewish couples experiencing infertility. Initially, the focus was to provide financial assistance, but it grew to include other forms of aid.

People are directed to Small Wonders via fertility clinics, doctors and rabbis, and ads are posted in mikvahs and community publications. The intention is to increase public awareness so that couples reach out as soon as they realize something is wrong.

The helpline is the first contact callers have with Small Wonders. From there, its peer-to-peer program matches up people with others who have endured similar experiences or medical procedures, whether it is in vitro fertilization (IVF), miscarriage or second-time infertility. Recently, a woman who was confronting cancer and was contemplating freezing her eggs contacted Small Wonders.

Because much of the organization's strength stems from its internal support network of couples, it promotes camaraderie through frequent events, which vary from educational, such as Q&As with medical professionals, and events like games nights and yoga classes.

Most events are held in Small Wonders' facility, centrally located on the Bathurst Street corridor. It has a discreet back entrance for privacy and houses a boardroom, lounge area and private computers for research use.

Small Wonders also helps couples through the medical process. "We'll do anything to assist a couple during treatments," Yona Elishis said. This could include obtaining quick medical referrals, assistance with administering medications and injections, or providing hospital transportation, hotel accommodation and even babysitting.

While Small Wonders provides emotional support to anyone, its financial assistance is reserved for Jewish couples, and is determined by a committee based on need and eligibility. An IVF procedure costs approximately $15,000, and since success is not guaranteed, repeat procedures are often required. The exorbitant costs climb quickly and, except in limited, specific circumstances, are not covered by OHIP.

Hundreds of couples have been assisted in some way by Small Wonders, and more than 100 babies have been born since its inception. While most IVF clients thankfully achieve success, it is often after years of emotional and physical stress. One couple involved with Small Wonders finally conceived after their 11th IVF procedure.

Upon a baby's birth, some appreciative families make a financial donation to the organization, which, in turn, assists other couples.

Small Wonders employs various fundraising endeavours, but raises most of its resources through two unique annual events: A Night of Wonder, a glamorous evening of design and décor, and the Small Wonders bake sale, now in its seventh year. Scheduled for May 13 from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. at 122 Bannockburn Ave., the sale is an elegant display of beautifully packaged and scrumptious baked goods, from challahs and cheesecakes to cake-pops and fondant cakes. Hundreds of items are prepared by women citywide and many local food establishments donate kosher-certified items. As well, nearly two-dozen florists contribute striking arrangements that both beautify the sale and are available for purchase, fresh for the Shavuot holiday.

The anticipated event, which is always sold out, is run completely by volunteers from throughout the Jewish community. Not only do many people help support the organization, but the event creates awareness of Small Wonders.

"Our primary goal is to help as many couples as possible," said Shaindy Seidenfeld. Concurrently, it also strives to increase people's sensitivity towards childless couples.

"Our experiences have taught us all about sensitivity," said Pamela Kuhl, noting how comments are sometimes thoughtlessly dispensed. While the desire for children is often assumed by others, "you never know what's going on," she said. Children are both essential and celebrated in our life-cycle-centred culture, and while they are always a blessing, sometimes the miracle of their existence is far from small.

Carleton cafeteria offers kosher brisket

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Carleton University students stressed out by exams may have been comforted by memories of bubbie's kitchen April 18 when the university introduced fresh kosher brisket into its main residence cafeteria.

The campus eatery added 18 kilograms of the Jewish comfort food to the day's meal options, hoping to serve it throughout the lunch and dinner hours to students who live on and off campus.

Instead, it was gone before half the lunch period was even over, said Lewis Novack, a self-described modern Orthodox second-year biology student who has been at the forefront of the push to introduce a kosher meat option to the university's all-you-can-eat dining service.

"It was funny to watch how everyone just lined up for it, and it sold out in an hour," he said, adding that not everybody who ate the brisket was observing kashrut. Some treated it as just another food option.

The brisket was made using a new pot and new cooking and serving utensils, said Novack, who advised Carleton's dining services on how to adhere to kashrut laws in preparing it. The task was simplified by the fact the chef had worked for a kosher caterer in Toronto and was familiar with the rules.

The next goal is finding a way to make the food available to everybody while ensuring there's enough for the people who really need it, and possibly eventually bringing in a mashgiach to supervise the preparation, he added.

Until now, options for kosher students have been limited to sandwiches made off campus, but those meals were meat-free. Otherwise, students could choose vegetarian food options or cook their own food that they purchased from the closest supermarket with kosher food, a Loblaws that Novack said is a 30-minute bus ride from campus.

He said he's been working on the kosher meat option since moving to Ottawa from his home in Halifax.

"I'm kosher in Halifax, and I thought... because it's a bigger [Jewish] population [in Ottawa] and it's a university that they would somewhat accommodate and have kosher food already, but they didn't," he said.

So he took it upon himself to work with Carleton's dining services to introduce it.

He spoke with the university's vice-president of student services, who told him food services had tried it in the past, such as by offering kosher hot dogs in the university centre, but it didn't prove popular enough to keep, Novack said.

However, the administrator told Novack there was no reason why a kosher option couldn't be tried again.

Novack said it's important to introduce kosher food options into the residence cafeteria, which, unlike other food services on campus, operates on an all-you-can-eat basis and is the main place for students with meal plans to eat. (The plans are mandatory for students in most residence buildings.)

Novack said he knows about 40 or 50 students on campus who would take advantage of a regular kosher option in the cafeteria.

Currently, the cafeteria serves halal food for Muslims, but students must request it and it's not available to the general public, Novack said.

But if it can serve halal food and vegetarian options, there's no reason it couldn't have kosher options, he reasoned.

When he returns in September for his third year, Novack said he plans to meet with cafeteria chefs to further the conversation on how they can continue to offer kosher options, as well as setting up rabbinic supervision.

Judging by the brisket, "this seems to be working," Novack said. "If they're going to do it, may as well make it worthwhile for all the students, not just the Jewish students."

Carleton University's cafeteria offered a brisket lunch to students on April 18.

Ottawa conference honours Azrieli family

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Azrieli Foundation and the Azrieli family were honoured at a recent dinner hosted by Roseann O'Reilly Runte, president of Carleton University.

The tribute was part of the conference "If Not Now, When? Responsibility and Memory After the Holocaust," held at Carleton on April 24 and 25, in recognition of Canada's assumption of the chair of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) for 2013-14.

David Azrieli and his family founded the Azrieli Series of Holocaust Survivor Memoirs.

O'Reilly Runte spoke about how Azrieli "left family and home at the age of 17, one step ahead of soldiers..." He eventually made it to Palestine, where he served in the Israel Defence Forces and later studied at the Technion in Haifa. After immigrating to Montreal, Azrieli made a name for himself as a property developer both in Canada and in Israel.

"At the age of 73, he undertook the study of architecture at Carleton," said O'Reilly Runte, and "in 2008 we named the school of architecture after him."

Naomi Azrieli, David Azrieli's daughter, said that her family's desire to help other Canadian survivors write and publish their stories led to their founding the memoirs project.

"The work that we do in publishing memoirs and perpetuating memory in this way is particularly dear to my heart," she said.

Her father spent 10 years writing his own story and "when he came to the end of his own long road... he discovered he was very lucky because he found a publisher."

To date, 31 books have been published and another seven are near completion. Fourteen of them have received awards. "So, out of a family discussion... has come a program that has changed the landscape for survivor memoirs in Canada," said Azrieli.

The conference was attended by some 200 registrants, including academics, parliamentarians, survivors, community leaders and members of the public who gathered at the university to discuss issues around the IHRA's mandate of remembrance, education and research.

Speakers at the conference included Immigration Minister Jason Kenney and MPs Mark Adler, John McKay, Elizabeth May and Irwin Cotler. Cotler delivered the keynote address in a session titled "The Holocaust, Genocide and Human Rights: Universal Lessons for Our Time."

The conference was chaired by Deidre Butler, associate director of the Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies, and co-chaired by Shawna Dolansky, assistant director of the centre.

Assad used chemical weapons: IDF analyst

Mitch Ginsburg
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force's top intelligence analyst said April 20 that the army was quite certain that Syrian President Bashar Assad deployed chemical weapons against rebel forces in Syria on March 19.

"To the best of our understanding, the regime used lethal chemical weapons," said Brig.-Gen. Itai Brun, head of the research and analysis division at the IDF Military Intelligence Directorate.

Speaking at a security conference in Tel Aviv, Brun said further that based on the pictures of the victims – the size of their pupils "and the foam coming out of their mouths" – the army believed that Assad's troops had used the lethal nerve gas sarin as a weapon.

Sarin, used in a terror attack in Japan in 1995 as well as by former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein in aerial strikes against Iraqi Kurds in 1988, is a nerve agent that cripples the respiratory system. It is hundreds of times more toxic than cyanide and is considered a weapon of mass destruction.

U.S. Defence Secretary Chuck Hagel said on April 19 during a visit to Israel that "the Syrian government's use of chemical weapons would be a game changer."

Also that day, Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon described three red lines for Israel on Syria – the transfer of sophisticated weapons systems to rogue elements, the violation of Israel's sovereignty along the border, and the rebels' acquisition of chemical weapons.

Brun said that in Syria today there are more than 1,000 tons of chemical weapons, including sarin and VX, both of which can be deployed from artillery rounds and long-range ballistic missiles.

Chemical weapons have been used on more than one occasion in Syria, and the world's persistent reluctance to act in response to the use of those weapons is typical of the major powers' current approach to the tremors shaking the Middle East, he said.

Brun described U.S. hegemony as "dominant but eroding" and said that the world powers "prefer to focus elsewhere but are sucked into the Middle East."

Pointing to a slide featuring three images – of ineffectual UN observers in Syria, of a dead Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi splayed on the hood of a jeep and of the P+5 talks with Iran – he said all three depicted situations in which world involvement "did not attain achievements."

The region, he said, is undergoing "architectural changes" that will likely not stabilize in the coming years. Dominant among them has been the rise of Sunni Islamist parties, the shifting nature of global jihad and the weakening of the Iran-Syria alliance. Worsening economic conditions, unprecedented sanctions and upcoming national elections in June have weakened Iran's position and created "an interesting gap" between Iran's capabilities and its progress in advancing its nuclear program.

"This is not a good time for Iran," he said, adding that the regime would likely neither forgo its nuclear program nor break out for the bomb in the coming year.

It is clear, though, that the Sunni Islamist movements are ascendant and that the Salafist global jihad has changed its outlook. Perched on either side of Israel, he said, "their agenda has become more local, regional."

And though the dwindling threat of a standard military attack on Israel has lowered the overall security risk to the country, it has also brought new challenges to the fore. Referring to the surprise attack in October 1973, he said, "We also have to be prepared for a cyber Yom Kippur [War]."

Judge rules women's arrests not warranted

JTA

JERUSALEM — Women praying out loud at the Western Wall in prayer shawls do not disturb the public order and should not have been arrested, an Israeli court found.

The Jerusalem District Court ruled April 25 that five members of Women of the Wall should not have been arrested on April 11. The court also rejected a police request for a restraining order barring women from the site.

The women, members of the group that has agitated for women's prayer rights at the Western Wall, were arrested earlier this month and questioned for several hours by police before their release. Jerusalem Magistrate Court Judge Sharon Larry-Bavly ordered their release and rejected the police request that they be prevented from visiting the site for three months.

The hearing on April 25 considered an appeal by the police over the restraining order.

In his decision, Judge Moshe Sobell said that the Supreme Court decision of 2003, which upheld a government ban on women wearing tefillin or tallit prayer shawls and reading from a Torah scroll at the Western Wall was never intended to serve as an injunction which would apply criminal violations to women, according to a statement issued by the Women of the Wall after the hearing.

The decision also did not ban Women of the Wall from praying in the women's section, he said. The judge said that the women were not a danger to the public and that their prayer did not disturb the public order.

"The most important aspect of this ruling is the fact that Women of the Wall's prayer in the women's section of the Western Wall does not violate the 'local custom' and therefore does not imply a reasonable doubt of violation of the Law of Holy Places The court has rejected any reasonable cause for a policy of repeated detainment and arrests of Women of the Wall by police," said the group's attorneys, David Barhoum and Einat Horovitz, in a statement.

Women of the Wall has held a special prayer service at the holy site almost each month for the last 20 years on Rosh Chodesh, the beginning of the new Hebrew month, at the back of the women's section.

Women participating in the Rosh Chodesh service have been arrested nearly every month since June for wearing prayer shawls or for "disturbing public order."

"Today Women of the Wall liberated the Western Wall for all Jewish people. We did it for the eight-year-old girl who can now dream of having her Bat Mitzvah at the Wall and for the grandmother who cannot climb on a chair in order to see her grandson's Bar Mitzvah. We did it for the great diversity of Jews in the world, all of whom deserve to pray according to their belief and custom at the Western Wall," Anat Hoffman, the group's chair, said in a statement.

Shmuel Rabinowitz, the rabbi of the Western Wall and the holy sites of Israel, responded to the ruling in a statement issued Thursday. "The Western Wall is our last remaining unifying place. It is easy to set it ablaze with the fires of dispute. It is much harder to find the middle road which would allow all to continue to feel they belong and are welcome at the Western Wall. I implore the authorities and the silent majority that cares about the Western Wall to prevent fanatics from all sides from turning the Western Wall plaza into an area of conflict between brethren."

"The decision of the District Court and the reactions to it only strengthen the need for a sustainable, agreed solution, which will allow every Jew to feel at home at the Western Wall, as the basis for any resolution. An agreed solution reached through dialogue, understanding and mutual compromise will ensure that the Western Wall remains a symbol of unity for the entire Jewish people," Natan Sharansky, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel, said in a statement issued Thursday afternoon.

Sharansky added: "Now that we have an agreed outline, I call on all the sides to move forward and implement it."

Israeli Chief Rabbinate backs oral suction for brit milahs

JTA

BERLIN — Israel's Chief Rabbinate issued a letter to Berlin's Chabad rabbi upholding the importance of a controversial circumcision rite, metzitzah b'peh.

The Berlin rabbi, Yehudah Teichtal, is the subject of a complaint by anti-circumcision activists for allegedly allowing the rite to be performed last month on his newborn son. The complainants argue that metzitzah b'peh, in which blood is sucked orally from the circumcision wound, violates German laws regulating circumcision. Rabbi Teichtal has neither confirmed nor denied that metzitzah b'peh was performed at his son's bris.

Rabbi Moshe Morsiano, chair of the division of circumcision for the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, said in his letter dated April 22 that there is no justification for avoiding metzitzah b'peh, "unless the mohel has a sore in his mouth, or some infectious disease."

The Jewish legal opinion came from Rabbi Morsiano after the complaint was lodged against Rabbi Teichtal. Berlin's state prosecutor is looking into the merits of the complaint.

Germany adopted a new law regulating ritual circumcision last December. The law requires that the procedure be done to the highest possible medical standards.

Metzitzah b'peh has come under fire from many Jewish groups, including modern Orthodox associations, due to the possible spread of infections that can be fatal to an infant. Opponents recommend the use of a glass pipette in place of direct oral suction.

Drone shot down

Israel's Air Force shot down an unmanned aerial vehicle, or UAV, off the coast of Haifa. The UAV was identified approaching the Israeli coast and was intercepted by the air force five miles off the coast of Haifa on April 25, the Israel Defence Forces said. The vehicle reportedly came from Lebanon and is believed to have been launched by Hezbollah. It's the second time a UAV has been intercepted in Israeli air space within the past seven months, the IDF said. The last unmanned aircraft, shot down in October, also originated in Lebanon and flew over several Israeli cities before being downed over southern Israel.

No charges against jails

Israel's state prosecutor won't bring criminal charges against the Israel Prison Service for the death of dual Australian-Israeli national Ben Zygier. The prosecutor's report, released April 25, showed that there's evidence that Zygier, who was previously known as Prisoner X, died after committing suicide on Dec. 15, 2010 in the high-security Ayalon Prison as a result of failures by the Israel Prison Service. But the report said there isn't enough evidence to bring criminal charges against the service or any of its personnel. According to the report, on the day of his suicide, Zygier received a visit from his wife, at which time he received "bad news." The report also said that Zygier attempted suicide twice while in prison, saw three different psychiatrists and met with social workers 57 times during his nine months there. The case has not been closed.

No parole for Katzav

Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni recommended that President Shimon Peres reject a parole request from former president Moshe Katzav. Livni made the recommendation to Peres April 23. Her recommendation reflects the position of the Justice Ministry's parole board. Katzav, 65, is serving a seven-year jail sentence for two counts of rape and other sexual offences. He entered prison in December 2011. The pardon request was filed by his wife, Gila, in October. Livni said in her recommendation to Peres that "the request submitted by his family describes the suffering that he and his family have endured since the story became known, including the accompanying publicity and public condemnation. I do not take the Katzav family's suffering lightly, but it is not sufficient to justify parole." She also wrote that she took into consideration the women "whose honour he trampled and whose bodies and souls he desecrated while misusing his power and authority as an elected public official." Livni said that Katzav's continued claims of innocence and his refusal to apologize or express remorse figured into her decision.

UN official blames U.S. support of Israel for bombing

JTA

NEW YORK — Richard Falk, an official for the U.N. Human Rights Council, in an online commentary blamed the Boston Marathon bombing on "Tel Aviv."

"[A]s long as Tel Aviv has the compliant ear of the American political establishment, those who wish for peace and justice in the world should not rest easy," Falk, the council's special rapporteur on the Palestinian territories, wrote in an Op-Ed posted to the online Foreign Policy Journal on Tuesday.

Falk, who has said the George W. Bush administration was complicit in the 9/11 attacks, also called the Boston attack "retribution" for the actions of the U.S. military in Afghanistan, Iraq and Pakistan.

"The American global domination project is bound to generate all kinds of resistance in the post-colonial world," Falk wrote. "In some respects, the United States has been fortunate not to experience worse blowbacks, and these may yet happen, especially if there is no disposition to rethink U.S. relations to others in the world, starting with the Middle East."

In recent months, Falk published an antisemitic cartoon on his blog and called for a boycott of Israel.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird condemned Falk's comments and called for his immediate removal from his UN post.

"Once again, United Nations official Richard Falk has spewed more mean-spirited, antisemitic rhetoric, this time blaming the attacks in Boston on President Obama and the State of Israel. The United Nations should be ashamed to even be associated with such an individual," Baird said in a statement.

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, sent letters to UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon and the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, calling on them to condemn Falk's "odious and preposterous" remarks.

UN spokesman Farhan Haq, according to UN Watch, called Falk "an independent expert" and said Ban "did not appoint him and is not responsible for his views, which he has criticized in the past."

"Mr. Falk reports to the Human Rights Council, which is comprised of different member states," Haq said, according to UN Watch.

Former Iranian president takes softer stance on Israel

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Iran's influential former president has taken a softer stance toward Israel than the position President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's usually takes in his anti-Israel remarks.

Several Iranian newspapers, including the pro-reform Shargh daily, on Monday quoted Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani as saying, "We are not at war with Israel.

"We are not eager to go to war with Israel, but if the Arabs wage war on it, we will support them," Iranian national radio quoted Rafsanjani telling reporters.

The remark is seen as part of growing calls by high-profile Iranian politicians, including potential presidential candidates, to repair Iran's image abroad. Ahmadinejad's comments since 2005 that Israel should be destroyed have prompted an international outcry.

Last week, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, the mayor of Tehran– who is considered a potential candidate in the June presidential election – said the president's anti-Jewish remarks have damaged Iran.

Rafsanjani has not said whether he plans to run in the election.

In related news, a former head of Israel Defence Forces Military Intelligence, said on April 20 that Iran has essentially crossed the "red line" set by Israel for its nuclear activity and that the coming few months will be a crucial period.

Speaking at a security conference in Tel Aviv, Maj.-Gen. (res.) Amos Yadlin said that "for all intents and purposes, Iran has crossed Israel's red line... in the summer, Iran will be a month or two away from deciding about a bomb."

Unless there is a drastic increase in international pressure on the Islamic Republic, Yadlin said, Iran will continue to expand its nuclear program.

"There won't be an agreement if there isn't a price for [not] reaching one," he added.

In a speech before the United Nations last September, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu laid out a "red line" for Iran, and in later interviews he clarified that Iran's enrichment activities must stop before they produce enough 20 per cent-enriched uranium for a single bomb, some 240 kilograms.

Yadlin said that because of the June Iranian elections, Israel and the West had until then to decide on a military option to destroy or curtail Iran's nuclear operation, and expressed assurance that Israel was up to the task with or without direct help from the United States.

Saskatchewan's PotashCorp won't buy Israel Chemicals

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — One of the world's largest potash manufacturers won't buy Israel Chemicals, Potash Corporation of Saskatchewan said in a statement last week, following weeks of pressure within Israel to cancel the deal.

While the sale would "be of tremendous benefit to stakeholders of both companies and the State of Israel, there must be receptivity to foreign investment and certainty in the rules that govern such investment," the statement read.

"Now is not the time to pursue this opportunity and [we] will focus our energies on other options to maximize shareholder value," PotashCorp concluded.

Israel Chemicals, owned by Israel Corp, which is controlled by Idan Ofer, said it would pursue other possible ways of investment and business development.

The Israeli group said it was "a strong company" with a bright and attractive future in many fields.

Earlier last month, Finance Minister Yair Lapid spoke out against the proposed merger between PotashCorp and ICL, saying Israelis should benefit from the country's natural resources.

Employees of ICL have vehemently opposed the deal, which would increase PotashCorp's grip on the potash industry. The potassium-based product, which ICL produces at its Dead Sea plant, is primarily used in fertilizers.

The Rotem Amfert Negev plant of Israel Chemicals, by the Dead Sea (Flash90 Photo)

"Israel's natural resources are public property, and the Israeli public should be the first to benefit from them," Lapid said.

He also called for the creation of a committee to re-examine Israel's rights to natural resources that are managed by private companies.

In late February, before he was named finance minister, Lapid called the sale of ICL to PotashCorp an "un-Zionist act."

The Canadian company was seeking to increase its current 13.8 per cent share of ICL to somewhere between 51 and 100 per cent.

The deal would have required approval by the Israeli government, which holds a "golden share" in the Israel Corporation, ICL's parent company. It allows special voting rights in a company, including veto power on mergers.

Talks came to a standstill as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu struggled to form a new government following January's elections. But in recent weeks, PotashCorp has been renewing its lobbying effort with top government officials, including the prime minister, a known proponent of privatization.

Jews were 'like Nazis,' Mandate boss said

JTA

LONDON — The British high commissioner of Palestine viewed Jewish fighters there in the 1940s as analogous to Nazis, newly published records show.

On April 30, 1948, Alan Cunningham wrote to his superiors that as the Jews celebrated military successes, their "broadcasts, both in content and in manner of delivery, are remarkably like those of Nazi Germany." In another report, he said that the Jews were prepared for statehood and an "all-out offensive" with "all the equipment of a totalitarian regime."

The reports were made public last week as part of a release of colonial administration records by the National Archives in London, the Jewish Chronicle of London reported last Friday.

A week before the British departure from Mandate Palestine, the high commissioner mistakenly believed that "all the ingredients of a successful truce were present," the documents also showed.

Alan wrote on April 30 that the Arabs' "much vaunted liberation army" was "poorly equipped and badly led." He wrote, "In almost every engagement, the Jews have proved their superiority in organization, training and tactics."

Israeli NGO warns pension giant against divestment

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Shurat HaDin – Israel Law Center is warning the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association – College Retirement Equities Fund (TIAA-CREF) that it risks violating U.S. federal and state laws if it adopts a resolution boycotting firms that do business in Israel.

In a letter to TIAA-CREF, Shurat HaDin warned it would launch civil suits if the pension fund manager adopts the boycott measure at its membership meeting this summer.

TIAA-CREF is one of the largest pension funds in the world, with nearly $3.7 billion (US) under management. It provides financial services for people in the academic, research, medical and cultural fields.

The divestment measure was proposed by the shareholder activist group, Jewish Voice for Peace. The group's website said it wants TIAA-CREF "to consider divesting from companies that contribute to violations of human rights, including companies whose business supports Israel's occupation of the West Bank."

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, director of Shurat HaDin, said divestment or boycott would violate New York and U.S. laws. New York law defines boycotts as "unlawful discriminatory practice." Shurat HaDin's letter also pointed out that under the Ribicoff Amendment to the federal Tax Reform Act of 1976 – designed at the time to counter the Arab boycott of Israel – it is a federal violation to "participate in or co-operate with an international boycott."

According to Shurat HaDin's mission statement, it fights for the rights of terror victims, "seeks to bankrupt terror groups and grind their criminal activities to a halt one lawsuit at a time."

"We became known for the terror victim litigation but were always involved with a number of Israeli and world Jewish community issues. The BDS movement has escalated to be a national security threat to Israel and endangers all Israeli citizens, businesses and the armed forces, today. Since it is at its heart antisemitic, we feel compelled to act. Accordingly, we are trying to do what we can to confront these issues," said Darshan-Leitner.

The boycott, divestment and sanctions movement is an extension of the Arab boycott of Israel, she stated.

"Considering that the TIAA-CREF's corporate charter limits its proper function to conducting business 'to aid and strengthen nonprofit colleges, universities' we do not understand how a biased and malicious resolution like this can properly be presented to their membership. The resolution violates standing laws, is contrary to public policy and must be abandoned," Darshan-Leitner stated.

Meanwhile, an article in Pensions & Investments reported that TIAA-CREF officials are asking the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) for permission to ignore the Jewish Voice for Peace's divestment proposal. The proposal, if implemented, would see the pension asset manager divest from companies such as Caterpillar, Motorola, Veolia Transportation and Northrop Grumman.

Two years ago, Jewish Voice for Peace filed a shareholder proposal that called on TIAA-CREF to consider divesting from three companies doing business in West Bank communities – Caterpillar, Veolia Environment and Elbit. At the time TIAA-CREF asked the SEC for permission to set aside the proposal and not bring it before shareholders. The SEC granted the request. In a letter outlining its decision, the SEC adopted the arguments advanced by TIAA-CREF, among them that the company had conducted a review of its policies and that, "To the extent [that]... the proponents in fact seek specific investment activities and decisions rather than review, the proposal impermissibly interferes with the conduct of TIAA-CREF's ordinary business operations and is excludable."

As the SEC ponders TIAA-CREF's current request, Shurat HaDin is in contact with "a large number of Israeli companies that have been subject to sanctions, divestment or have been picketed. We're trying to let them know that there are legal recourses," Darshan-Leitner told The CJN.

Too many companies seem to believe "that if you ignore it, it will go away," she said. "Some companies may not want the publicity, they're hoping it goes away or they are taking a wait-and-see approach. This is a flawed strategy."

Shurat HaDin has adopted a proactive approach, which has paid off in the past, she said. As an example, she pointed to an attempt by anti-Israel activists to run the Israeli blockade of Gaza. Shurat HaDin contacted maritime insurance companies, advising them the blockade-running ships could be smuggling arms to Hamas and that lawsuits could result if it provided the ships with insurance. Shurat HaDin also cautioned satellite radio providers about providing service to the ships, arguing that doing so would violate U.S. law. Those steps help scuttle the flotilla plans, she said.

Nevertheless, she continued, "the BDS [movement] has become gigantic. It's almost like a tsunami coming at Israel from all directions. Israeli companies don't have a handle on it."

Referring to the warning letter, she said, "This is only the beginning. It's the beginning of pushing back against the boycott movement."

Meanwhile, Shurat HaDin is planning to open a Canadian office in the Toronto area, perhaps by early May, according to Darshan-Leitner.

The non-governmental organization has hired a lawyer and will rely as well on the legal services of other volunteers, she said in a telephone interview.

Sisters design 'environmentally responsible' jewelry

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Two Toronto sisters, Jenna and Davida Goldenberg, design environmentally friendly jewelry that they sell online.

Jenna, 28, and Davida, 27, create the jewelry with 935 Argentium Sterling Silver, which is recycled silver that's one per cent purer than sterling silver. It's offered through their company, Pontus & Hawke.

"Argentium silver has many positive attributes that sterling silver does not possess," said Jenna. "It is hypoallergenic, tarnish resistant and shines a brighter white than platinum. We want to enable consumers to buy unique high-quality products that are both socially and environmentally responsible."

She added that Pontus & Hawke clientele can feel pride when wearing their pieces "because they are both supporting the economy and making evolved choices in regards to their consumption."

Davida told The CJN that they have been drawing since they were kids.

"We draw up all the [jewelry] designs, and we create a three-dimensional image on the computer," she said. "Our core value is to remain Canadian in every aspect from design to manufacturing."

Jenna and Davida are recent graduates of the Academy of Design in Toronto. Jenna attended York University, where she got a degree in administrative studies and marketing. Davida has a diploma in art and art history from Sheridan College and a degree from the University of Toronto in art and art history.

The young entrepreneurs said that they were fortunate to receive assistance from their family in establishing their business.

"Our parents, Dr. Leslie and Susan Goldenberg, were encouraging and enthusiastically helped us get on our feet," Jenna said.

"And our brother, Ben, helped us with the technical aspects of the website. It was so helpful to have a supportive family while setting up our business."

Davida said that fashion blogs have helped them expand their business. They have also been featured in home and fashion magazines.

"Originally, there were four partners," she added. "But two went their own way, to achieve other goals."

Davida and Jenna and one of their former partners brainstormed to come up with the company name Pontus & Hawke. We "came with a list of names and events that included an ancient pre-Olympian god, Pontus, and HMS Hawke, a British battleship that was destroyed by the Germans in World War I," Davida said.

"The battleship had been launched on March 11, 1891, and March 11, 2012, was the launch date of our company. From that moment on, Pontus & Hawke was the name of our company.

"We plan on extending the Pontus & Hawke brand in the near future to include a chic sportswear line for both men and women," she said.

"We will design the clothing, and they will be manufactured in Canada. And in time, we hope to have our designs in stores as well as on the web."

A primer on Polish Holocaust movies

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

The first Polish feature film to portray the infamous Jedwabne massacre of 1941, during which Catholic Poles beat to death or burned alive nearly all of the town's Jews, opened recently in theatres in Poland.

Wladyslaw Pasikowski's Aftermath, which tells the story of a Polish man who learns a dark secret about his family's past, forced Poles yet again to confront one of the most unsavoury episodes of the Holocaust in Nazi-occupied Poland.

Aftermath is neither the first nor the last Polish movie to deal with the Holocaust. Indeed, as Marek Haltof observes in Polish Film and the Holocaust: Politics and Memory (Berghahn Books), the Holocaust, within the context of World War II, has been a major topic of Polish cinema.

In what he claims is the first book-length study on the subject, Haltof – a professor of literature and film at Northern Michigan University – says that Polish movies about the Holocaust and Polish-Jewish relations in general have always reflected the political reality of the day.

When Poland was under the sway of communism, he observes, Polish films that explored antisemitism linked the phenomenon to fascism and prewar "bourgeois" values. During the period after 1967, when a state-orchestrated campaign of antisemitism thinly disguised as anti-Zionism drove out many Jews, the Holocaust as a theme virtually disappeared from Polish films.

With the return of democracy in the late 1980s, Polish film directors were finally able to explore themes that the previous political order had deemed unacceptable.

Describing his book as a contribution to a neglected field of study, Haltof examines Polish-language films shot in Poland with significant Polish participation and films made by filmmakers of Polish origin, regardless of their nationality.

In postwar Poland, the first film to deal with the Holocaust was Leonard Buczkowski's Forbidden Songs, released in 1947. A year later, Saul Goskind's Our Children, the first postwar Yiddish film on the Holocaust, came out. But it was not approved for general screening by the Communist authorities, and Goskind immigrated to Israel.

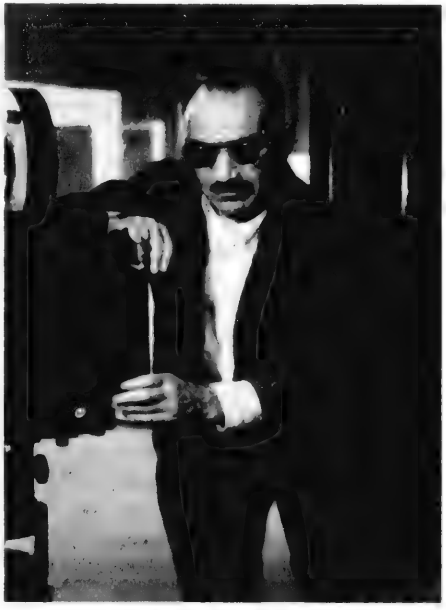
Polish films about the war tended to focus on concentration camp survivors trying to rebuild their lives. They made few direct references to the plight of Polish Jews, 90 per cent of whom perished during the Holocaust.

According to Haltof, the mother of all Holocaust films during the early postwar era was Wanda Jakubowska's The Last Stage, which provided a template for representations of victimhood and heroism under the Nazi yoke. Documenting her own experiences in Auschwitz, it was politically correct by virtue of emphasizing the role of the Red Army in liberating the camp.

The first movie to portray the Warsaw Ghetto uprising was Aleksander Ford's Border Street (1949). Ford, a Jew who survived the war in the Soviet Union, was forced to modify it to appease communist functionaries. Due to state antisemitism, he left Poland in 1969. He committed suicide in 1980 in Naples, Florida.

The second phase in Polish Holocaust films, known as the Polish School Period, unfolded between 1955 and 1965 on the heels of Joseph Stalin's death and a political thaw in Poland.

By Haltof's estimation, this era began with Andrzej Wajda's A Generation, a coming-of-age socialist realist film that examined Polish-Jewish relations from the perspective of Poland's left-wing underground movement. Probably best known for the classic Ashes and Diamonds, Wajda devoted more time to this topic than any other major Polish director, he claims.



Aleksander Ford in 1958.

But as Haltof points out in a discerning observation, the majority of the Jewish characters who appear in his films are assimilated, non-religious Jews who have been thoroughly Polonized. In his films, "Jewishness is a negative concept, an identity imposed upon [Jews] by the Nazi oppressors and, to a certain extent, by the Polish antisemites," Haltof says, quoting the critic Ewa Mazierska.

Apart from Wajda, Haltof also mentions Andrzej Munk as one of the masters of the Polish School Period. A descendant of a Polonized Jewish family from Krakow, Munk was killed in a car accident before he could finish his masterpiece, The Passenger, which turns on the relationship between two women, a German SS guard and a camp inmate.

Haltof's discussion of the explicitly antisemitic period that prompted thousands of Jews to leave Poland is quite instructive.

Aside from the fact that distinguished Jewish filmmakers such as Jerzy Toeplitz and Jakub Goldberg were dismissed from their positions, the Polish government virtually banned the production of films relating to the Holocaust and Polish-Jewish relations. However, several movies on German concentration camps in Poland were permitted, as long as references to the extermination of Jews were omitted.

The sole film made from 1971 to 1982 that significantly incorporated a Holocaust motif into its script was Stanislaw Jedryka's Salad Days (1980), which traced a friendship between a Polish Catholic boy, a Polish Jewish boy and an ethnically German Polish girl.

The introduction of martial law in Poland in 1981 did not affect Polish directors with an interest in the Holocaust. In the wake of this event, one of the last gasps of communism, four films revolving around this theme played in theatres: Jerzy Kawalerowicz's Austeria, Waldemar Dziki's A Postcard from the Journey, Stefan Szlachtycz's Down Carrier and Jerzy Hoffman's According to the Decrees of Providence.

Haltof claims that the television screening of Claude Lanzmann's Shoah (1985) in Poland had a profound effect, influencing directors such as Agnieszka Holland (Angry Harvest) and Krzysztof Kieslowski (Decalogue).

With the fall of Communism, a succession of films dealing with the Holocaust were released, among them being Wajda's Korczak (1990) and Holy Week (1996).

Interestingly enough, as Haltof notes, the advent of democracy emboldened two filmmakers, Radoslaw Piwowarski and Jacek Bromski, to deal with a theme that would have been outside the usual norms of inquiry under communism: the antisemitic events of 1968. They respectively directed March Almonds and Happy New Year.

In passing, Haltof touches on Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List, which was filmed in Poland, and Roman Polanski's The Pianist, both of which won Academy Awards.

Concluding his illuminating survey, Haltof writes about made-in-Poland documentaries on the Holocaust. This chapter is thorough and erudite, like the rest of Polish Film and the Holocaust.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Design is Gluckstein's passion

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Brian Gluckstein's path to a career in design and interior decoration was perhaps preordained, paved when he was a very young man.

"I was sensitive to space and very aware of the environment I was in," he mused, summing up his sensibilities.

By the age of 10, Gluckstein – the principal of GlucksteinDesign and one of Canada's most pre-eminent designers and interior decorators – was already tuned in to the myriad possibilities of space.

"I would move the furniture around in our home, usually when my parents were away in Florida," recalled Gluckstein, casually dressed one early morning in dark pants, a light blue V-neck sweater and a striped blue shirt open at the collar. "I would rearrange my room. It was clear I had some interest in design. Yes, it was an indicator of things to come."

Rather than berating their son for rearranging his furniture to suit his tastes, Larry and Barbara Gluckstein, the proprietors of furniture stores in Toronto, encouraged him to act on his creative impulses.

As he looks back, Gluckstein refers to other signposts in his life that pointed him toward the world of design. He remembers his father's friend, who would give him sophisticated European design magazines he'd devour in one sitting. And he recalls the influence his older sister, Joyce, a photo stylist today, exerted on him. "I got to see the projects she was working on," he said.

Contemplating his vocational future after graduating from Newtonbrook Secondary School, he was torn between architecture and interior design. He chose the latter partly because Joyce had only words of praise for the rigorous four-year interior design program she had taken at Ryerson University.

"I had all these people around me who exposed me to design," he said, summarizing the influences that affected him. "I don't know if a career in design was inevitable, but it was available if I wanted one."

In retrospect, Gluckstein, now 52, believes he was lucky to have been admitted to Ryerson, since some 700 applicants applied for for about only 70 places. "It wasn't some little decorating course," he said, adding that only 30 students eventually graduated. "It honed your skills. We had exposure to professionals in the industry."

On a more personal level, Ryerson was also useful to Gluckstein's development because it eased him out of his introverted shell. "I was really shy, and Ryerson taught me how to deliver presentations in front of people. Ryerson was an incredible school, an incredible experience."

Brian Gluckstein

With Ryerson behind him, Gluckstein landed a job with interior designer Linda Boorman. "I liked the small scale of it," he said. "I wanted creative input in projects and I got it. I wasn't just one of 100 employees."

Just as importantly, he observed, Boorman showed him how to run a business efficiently. "I learned everything there, from developing my drawing skills to dealing with clients," said Gluckstein.

Over the years, he has been influenced by such iconic figures as Jean-Michel Frank, who promoted minimalist interiors and developed the Parsons table; Billy Baldwin, the dean of American interior decorators, and Albert Hadley, who worked in a variety of styles and for American socialites.

If you ask Gluckstein what the most important asset he brings to the table, aside from his obvious artistic talents, he says it is the ability to listen to his clients' desires and whims. As he put it, "You can't impose anything on them. You have to create for them."

Gluckstein's strong work ethic is indubitably another one of his defining characteristics, a key to his success. He prides himself on being organized, disciplined and fiscally responsible. "I'm very efficient with my time," he noted. "I don't dither. I don't have time to waste."

Gluckstein, whose clientele runs the gamut from corporations to hotels, established his company in 1987 in midtown Toronto, in the vicinity of Yorkville. Today, he employs a staff of 22, two-thirds of whom are designers.

For the past 13 years, his headquarters have been in a refurbished Georgian-style building, formerly a printing house, which he reconfigured to look like an upscale British townhouse set in a courtyard.

From the outset, fortune smiled on him.

"I was recommended to clients by some important architects and given extraordinary commissions," said Gluckstein, who focuses on residential projects but whose resumé includes the interiors of the Four Seasons Hotel and the Windsor Arms Hotel in Toronto.

Nowadays, he works primarily with well-to-do families who want to upgrade their large, elegant and expensive homes.

"Residential design is where my passion lies," he said, sitting adjacent a wall plastered with magazine photographs of home interiors he designed or admires.

Two-thirds of his clients are Jewish.

"The Jewish community, worldwide but especially in Europe, has always been known to be adventurous in design."

Of his clients, he said, "They want special things. So we're constantly on the search for new items, some of which we design ourselves."

Typically, he finds the right furnishings in Toronto, the United States, Britain and France.

Being eclectic in his philosophy of design, Gluckstein fills space with both contemporary and traditional touches. "I like spaces that reflect a variety of styles and that are always comfortable and inviting."

He abhors clutter.

"I like organized and neat spaces," said Gluckstein, who lives in Toronto's Forest Hill and maintains a second home in Palm Beach, Florida. "I like a house that's very neat."

Gluckstein can afford to reject clients. As he said, "I've turned down many jobs. I have a responsibility to existing clients not to overload myself. And sometimes, the esthetics are not mutually compatible."

In 1999, he created GlucksteinHome, a line of high-end yet affordable home furnishings from bedding to outdoor furniture, sold in Canada at The Bay and Home Outfitters and in the United States at Lord & Taylor and independent stores.

"There was a void in the market, and I've tried to fill it," he said. "We design 3,000 to 5,000 items a year."

Gluckstein works hard, but he knows how to relax. Every month, he flies south to Florida for five to seven days to unwind in his contemporary home in Palm Beach.

"I have to get away from my hectic pace and recharge," he said.

Gluckstein also regularly travels to New York City, Paris and London to attend trade and design shows.

"These cities give me a lot of inspiration to push the envelope a bit."

Apart from tennis, he has no real hobbies to speak of. "Design," he said, "is my hobby."

JEWISHFICTION.NET AND NORA GOLD ARE BOTH THRIVING – SHE HAS A NEW NOVEL COMING OUT

Two years ago, Toronto author Nora Gold took a look at what was happening in the publishing industry, how it was all going digital, and saw the proverbial writing on the wall.

Concerned that "publishers were taking fewer and fewer books," Gold established a website dedicated to contemporary original Jewish fiction called Jewishfiction.net, which is entirely non-commercial and subsists on donations.

"I had heard from a lot of writers that they were having trouble finding publishers, and from many publishers about how hard it is to take on 'niche' fiction," Gold told me last week. "I was concerned that a lot of wonderful fiction was going to get lost along the way. That was my motive."

Jewishfiction.net recently published its 10th issue containing 16 pieces of fiction, seven of which were written by Israeli authors in honour of the recent Israeli Independence Day. The website has published an impressive roster of writers, including Elie Wiesel, Aharon Appelfeld, A.B. Yehoshua, Chava Rosenfarb, Nessa Rapoport, Steve Stern and Morley Torgov. It has received more than 40,000 visitors to date from more than 100 countries.

Gold, who maintains the website as a "labour of love," is herself a published author with an award-winning book of wonderful stories, Marrow and Other Stories, to her credit. She has also written a first novel, Fields of Exile, due for publication next year by Dundurn Press.

Set in a fictitious university, Fields of Exile deals with the ugly modern phenomenon of anti-Israel activism on campus, and it is Gold's hope it will help turn the tide against the current social hysteria within the political left of delegitimizing and demonizing Israel.

"There are a lot of well-meaning people around the world who just don't understand what anti-Israelism is. It's not just a form of criticizing, it's the new antisemitism."

Gold is the moderator of Writing and Publishing Jewish Fiction in Canada: Past, Present and Future, a panel discussion also featuring Martin Levin, Cynthia Good and Cary Fagan. Part of the 2013 Toronto Jewish Literary Festival, the event takes place at Ben McNally Books, 366 Bay St., Wednesday, June 5, 7:30 p.m. Admission is free and everyone is welcome.

Vision TV's four-part series explores global antisemitism

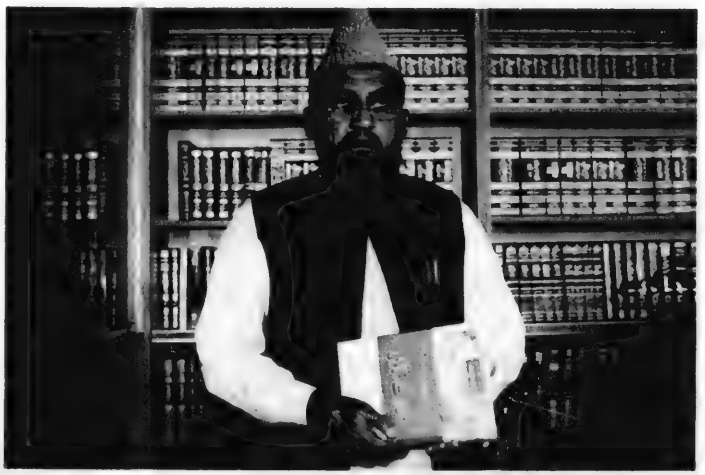
Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Canadian journalist and broadcaster Martin Himel sifts through the malodorous detritus of antisemitism, the world's most persistent pathological hatred, in Jew Bashing: The New Antisemitism, his important four-part series starting on Vision TV on May 6 at 9 p.m.

In the first segment, Himel examines its Muslim variant in Pakistan, Iran, Egypt and the Palestinian territories in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Himel's focus on the Muslim world is hardly surprising. "No group is as receptive to antisemitic conspiracy theories as Muslims," observes Hebrew University professor Robert Wistrich, an expert on the subject.

Himel, based in Israel, uses Muslim surrogates to conduct many of his interviews, believing the interviewees will be more relaxed and candid if questioned by a fellow Muslim. It's a valid assumption, judging by their answers. The anti-Jewish animus spilling from their mouths is shocking, even for a seasoned observer.



A Muslim cleric in Pakistan spouts antisemitic views.

In Lahore, a Pakistani student openly calls for the destruction of Jews, while a cleric claims that the 9/11 terrorist attacks were perpetrated by Jews. No Muslim could possibly commit such an immoral act, he adds self-righteously.

Still other Pakistanis contend that Jews control America, wield too much influence and dominate commerce, even in Pakistan, where a Jewish community no longer exists. At a Shiite Muslim school, meanwhile, a bearded teacher accuses Jews of sowing tension in Muslim lands.

Himel's foray into Iran is brief but telling. In his view, the Ayatollah Khomeini, the first supreme leader of post-revolutionary Iran, set an antisemitic tone by perpetuating the myth that Jews are ritually unclean.

The antisemitic rants of Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi are already on the record. But digging deeper, Himel excavates file footage in which an Egyptian protester standing in front of the Israeli embassy in Cairo holds aloft a placard reading, "The gas chambers are ready."

This clip is but the tip of an iceberg.

The editor of a major Egyptian daily says, "The Jews are far from being our friends." Another journalist claims that Jews recruited Osama Bin Laden, and that the Torah harbours nefarious plans for Jewish supremacy. A Sunni Muslim cleric even argues that Jews founded the Shiite sect.

My Mother, the Nazi Midwife and Me

Nancy Wigston
Special to The CJN

Montreal writer Gina Roitman was born in Passau, Germany, when her parents, Sula and Benzion Miedwiecki, were living in a displaced persons' camp eight kilometres outside the town.

The two survivors met and wed in the camp, immigrating to Montreal when Roitman was 18 months old. While other survivors' children heard only silence from their parents, Roitman's mother seemed unable to stop talking about her past.

One oft-told tale emphasized that Sula gave birth to her daughter in Passau's birthing hospital, rather than in the camp. "Too many babies were dying." So she made Benzion spend one of their precious gold rubles – they were saving for their new life in Canada – to cover the expense. Such stories seemed designed to elicit gratitude, but her Canadian daughter, cheerful by nature, thought her mother paranoid.

Roitman is the author of Tell Me a Story, Tell Me the Truth, published by Second Story Press. Her continuing story – and much more – unfolds in the moving documentary My Mother, The Nazi Midwife and Me, premièring on the CBC Documentary channel May 14 at 8 p.m.

Both of Roitman's parents had suffered grievous losses in the war. Sula's three-year-old son had starved to death, she told her daughter, because she was "too honest" to steal a potato for him. Rejecting her mother's worldview ("a perilous place"), Roitman felt burdened by Sula's stories. "I grew up with ghosts. They were my constant companions," she says from her Quebec home in the Lower Laurentian Mountains.

In 1976, Sula died "and the stories stopped." Yet, later in life, when Roitman began to realize her dream of becoming a writer, it was her mother's voice she heard most clearly. "I survived Hitler for this!" exclaimed Sula the day she came home to see her daughter practising gymnastics on their second-floor apartment balcony railing, a scene recounted in Roitman's story, An Imperfect Child. "What do I have to fear? Hitler's dead!" thought the little girl, a natural "daredevil."

Roitman had returned to Passau, a town she found "enchanting." But seeking her birth certificate at the town hall proved a waste of time. The office was closed. Then, in 1993, things took a startling turn when Roitman saw The Nasty Girl, a film based on the experiences of Passau native Anna Rosmus. An international sensation, the film details the ugly reaction of townspeople when a young woman probes into Passau's Nazi past.

By happy chance, a friend was able to connect Roitman with Rosmus, who immediately confirmed Sula's dark insinuations about goings-on in the camp clinic. Eventually, Roitman and producer friend Jane Hawtin joined an American War Veteran's Group, and travelled, video crew in tow, to Passau for the 60th anniversary of the war's end, an event heralded as "the liberation of Germany."

This visit forms the basis for Roitman's discovery of the shocking truth about her past. On film we see her speaking with students, with the town librarian (the library was once the birthing hospital), with Rosmus and a host of others. Most importantly, Roitman finds a witness. Survivor Solamon Brunner tells her that the Americans, growing suspicious about the disproportionate number of infant deaths at the DP camp, held an inquiry, performed autopsies and quietly found and punished the culprit – a Nazi midwife.

The story a daughter had not wanted to believe was true. Sula had not been paranoid, but had probably saved her child's life by insisting on leaving the camp to give birth in Passau. Today, Roitman is joined in her continuing search for archival facts by a retired German judge. Near the memorial to the dead from Passau's three wartime concentration camps, there also exists a memorial to the Jewish babies killed after the war.

Rosmus arranged with the town for a Shabbat dinner to be celebrated in the town hall. Visitors, war veterans and townsfolk attended, while an American Air Force rabbi officiated. In the surprise highlight of the evening, Passau's mayor presented Roitman with her birth certificate.

"Before I could talk, my mother and I were at odds," says Roitman today. But before Sula died, her daughter told her: "Everything I am I owe to you. Either I did it to prove to you I could do it, or to make you happy."

Today, Roitman helps child survivors write their stories. "I've found a path I never thought I would walk… As a child, people could not persuade me that the world was a dangerous place – to me, it was a feast," Roitman says.

"My mother tried to warn me, and she was right. We must not forget the past. We must ask for the stories before it's too late, for these stories tell us who we are."

Christians not exempt from Himel's scrutiny

In Gaza, Hamas leader Mahmoud al-Zahar claims that Jews were expelled from European countries because they committed treason. Ahmad Bahar, a member of the Palestinian Authority legislature, repeats the tiresome mantra that Jews seek world domination. "It's either us or them," he says ominously.

Christians in the Middle East are not exempt from Himel's scrutiny. Christian groups in the region, he contends, engage in antisemitism by questioning Israel's legitimacy.

In the second segment, Himel focuses on Europe. He interviews the sister-in-law of Tony Blair, the former prime minister of Britain. A convert to Islam, Lauren Booth is rabidly anti-Israel. People like her are careful not to express explicitly antisemitic views, yet their conspiracy theories smack of antisemitism.

Himel travels to France, where a Muslim fanatic of French nationality attacked a Jewish school last year, and to Malmo, a city in Sweden where Jews feel threatened by Muslim antisemitism.

The British novelist Howard Jacobson looks beyond the antisemitism clothed in anti-Zionist garb. The "new" antisemitism, he tartly observes, is really a newer version of the "old" antisemitism.

Episode 3 is on the United States and the impact of the Internet on the dissemination of antisemitism.

At a conference, a man claims that Wall Street and Hollywood are controlled by Jews: "They have tentacles everywhere." Yet another accusation is that a major pro-Israel organization pushed the United States into invading Iraq in 2003.

Himel correctly argues that the Internet empowers antisemites and gives them unprecedented reach and influence.

He interviews three anti-Jewish bloggers, all of whom live in small town America. Alex Linder, soft-spoken and well-groomed, says quite openly that Jews should be exterminated. Brother Nathanael Kapner, an Orthodox Christian monk who was born Jewish, gloats that his website has received 14 million hits since 2007. He describes the United States as a "Jew police state." Tom Metzger calls Jews "a key threat to the white race."

Some left-wing activists dabble in antisemitism, too. Ken O'Keefe suggests that Jews orchestrated 9/11. The African American novelist Alice Walker claims that "Zionists" control Congress.

In the final episode, Himel deals with Canada, which, he admits, has one of the best records in combating this ancient scourge.

Himel analyzes the United Church's critical attitude toward Israel's controversial settlement policy in the West Bank, wondering why it singles out Israel for special opprobrium.

He also zeroes in on the Montreal chassidic community's contentious relationship with some of its non-Jewish neighbours and studies the free speech vs. hate speech debate.

Himel, whose previous Vision TV documentary was on the plight of Christians in the Arab world, performs a valuable service in exposing the phenomenon of antisemitism in Muslim communities worldwide.

But Jew Bashing would have been more comprehensive and certainly far more informative had he also dwelled at length on neo-Nazism and traditional forms of Christian antisemitism.

Grandson shares musical legacy with deli mogul

Rosalin Krieger
Special to The CJN

Stacey Shopsowitz, 21, an upright and electric bass player who is the grandson of the late Sam Shopsowitz of Jewish delicatessen fame, is quietly carving out an interesting musical path.

One might say he's entered the "unofficial" family business: music. Turns out, his grandfather had unfulfilled musical ambitions of his own.

A 1984 obituary on Sam referred to him as a "frustrated musician," which Shopsowitz said is a fair assessment. Sam, an accordion player as far back as high school, was a regular performer, said Shopsowitz, and had a number of unsuccessful Hollywood auditions.

Shopsowitz said one of Sam's closest friends was former jingle writer and Tony Award-winning Jewish American composer Mitch Leigh, who told Shopsowitz that his grandfather was "the best guy I ever met."

Shopsowitz got hooked on jazz at age five, when his mother, Ellen Drevnig, took him to a Joshua Redmond modern jazz concert with a gospel jazz group as an opening act. But Shopsowitz considers himself a blues musician in the manner of Buddy Guy, who, Shopsowitz said, plays a lot of "happy" blues.

For Shopsowitz, blues is not solely about the pain of African-Americans; it's about "the smallest common denominator," he said. "If you listen to a B.B. King solo, he can say just as much with four notes as Charlie Parker can with 400. It's about communicating feeling through sound."

Shopsowitz cites three years of storytelling at the Toronto Heschel School as one of his influences. Two of his favourite storyteller musicians are African-American alternative singer-songwriter India Arie and Ravid Kahalani, of the critically acclaimed North and West African Israeli infused group Yemen Blues, whom Shopsowitz studied with.

Shopsowitz has played bass for the popular sibling Toronto and Los Angeles-based rock band Ménage and participates in Scarborough's East Collective youth music hip-hop program.

Shopsowitz said he was "really inspired" by his two summer terms with the Berklee Middle Eastern All-Star Ensemble program at the Berklee College of Music in Boston, where he shared a room with Turkish and Persian students.

Shopsowitz's parents would like him to pursue a law degree with music "on the side" because of the instability of a business, in which he can wait five to six months to get paid an amount sometimes lower than what was negotiated. But Shopsowitz is returning to Humber College to complete a contemporary music degree that encompasses mostly jazz, because in his third year he will learn music production and business, which will serve him well.

Shopsowitz's budding musical career connects him to his late grandfather – whom he only knows anecdotally and through photos – because he had serious musical aspirations that never came to fruition. In a sense, Shopsowitz is carrying on his grandfather's musical dream.

Stacey Shopsowitz got hooked on jazz, but considers himself a blues musician.

Fichman plays key role for Canada in Fed Cup win

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — For the second time in 10 weeks, Sharon Fichman of Toronto earned a decisive victory in her final match to advance Canada to the World Group Two level at Fed Cup tennis for 2014.

Second seeded Fichman and top seeded teammate Eugenie Bouchard edged Ukraine 3-2 in the fifth match of the best of five series on April 21 by defeating Elina Svitolina and Lesia Tsurenko 6-4, 6-3 in the final doubles match. Playing in Kiev, the Canadians upset the favored Ukrainians, who were playing indoors on their home clay court. The Canadians, earning their first World Group Two berth since 2011, also earned their first Fed Cup victory in Europe since 1995.

The Fed Cup is a year round global competition for women involving 64 nations, similar to Davis Cup for men.

Fichman also won the decisive doubles match against Brazil on February 10 in zonal competition to advance Canada to their World Group playoff at Ukraine. Her dramatic victories in 2013 continue a banner year for Fichman at the Fed Cup.

"Once again, Sharon just took control and led our team to victory in the doubles match. Against the Ukrainians, she was everywhere, using great energy. Sharon has the potential to be a great Fed Cup player. She's very feisty, she's a proud Canadian and she's a dream for Canadians to have on the team because that is the kind of player we want to have," said Canadian Fed Cup captain Sylvain Bruneau, who first selected Fichman to play the Fed Cup as a 14-year-old in 2005.

Fichman provided much drama and heroics over the two-day competition. After Bouchard lost the first match to Svitolina, Fichman (ranked 125th in singles) upset the 71st ranked Tsurenko 7-6 (5), 2-6, 6-3 to tie the series at 1-1. Hitting one defensive lob after another in long rallies, Fichman forced Ukraine's top seeded player to commit 91 unforced errors and 16 double faults.

"I am comfortable on the indoor red clay and used a strategy of playing every ball and fighting for every point, waiting for the unforced error and the strategy paid off," said Fichman following her victory.

Bouchard defeated Tsurenko 6-4, 7-5 in the third match. Fichman lost the fourth match 6-4, 7-6 (5) to Svitolina, but felt optimistic about winning the decisive fifth match.

"I wasn't worried about losing my singles match because I knew I would get another chance in doubles. As a player, all you can ask for is an opportunity and we made the most of it today," she said.

"We [the Canadian Fed Cup team] are very excited because we mesh so well," added the jubilant Fichman, who celebrated with her teammates with an on-court huddle and a party in Kiev following the tie.

Fichman has not won any major titles on the women's circuit thus far, but she has played the best tennis of her career at the Fed Cup.

Sharon Fichman

"There are many players like Sharon that seem to thrive in the Fed Cup atmosphere of playing for your country, but not necessarily doing as well in individual tournaments. Tennis is more supportive in the team environment at the Fed Cup. All the girls practice together and cheer each other on. What made Sharon's results impressive was that she won against a higher ranked player and on the road. Tsurenko, despite the support of her home country fans, faltered against Sharon," said tennis commentator Rennae Stubbs, who played the Fed Cup for Australia.

Given that Canada has played the Fed Cup without top seed Aleksandra Wozniak, who has been recovering from shoulder surgery since last September, Fichman was selected by Bruneau for the Fed Cup as the second seeded Canadian and earned her spot on the team in 2013 with her dramatic wins.

The 22- year-old is the first Jewish player to play the Fed Cup for Canada since Vicki Berner of Vancouver from 1964-68. Fichman has an impressive Fed Cup won/loss record of 22-7 over 23 ties since she started playing Fed Cup in 2005. She finished her junior career ranked fifth in the world in 2006, winning the prestigious Orange Bowl junior title in 2003.

Fichman was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Her parents moved to Israel after leaving Romania in 1983.

Fichman started playing tennis at age five following her brother Thomas, who was a top Canadian player in the 14-and-under category. She is the youngest athlete at age 14 to win a gold medal at the 2005 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Should Jesse Levine play Davis Cup for Canada in the World Group semi-finals in September, Fichman and Levine would become the first Canadian Jewish man and woman to play Davis and the Fed Cup in the same year since 1968.

It's Game On for annual road hockey tournament

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Prosserman JCC at the Sherman Campus will host the 2nd annual Game On Road Hockey Tournament on June 23.

Proceeds from the event will support summer camps and sports programs for children dealing with pediatric disabilities and illnesses. Last year's inaugural tournament featured hundreds of participants and raised more than $50,000.

The tournament features several youth divisions and one for adults. Participants will enjoy family activities, great hockey action and a variety of entertainment. Team and individual prizes will be awarded. Last year's top fundraiser won a trip for two to Florida to watch an NHL game in a private suite.

"The first tournament was simply amazing in terms of the experience had by so many participants and the results it produced through fundraising and sponsorship. It's also so unique to see kids helping kids. We can't wait for June," said tournament co-chair Michelle Zaldin.

The 2012 Game On video featured several prominent people in the world of sports, finance and politics, including NHL coaching legend Mike Keenan and Environment Minister Peter Kent. This year's video will feature ESPN's Dan Shulman, Paul Godfrey of Postmedia and others.

For more information or to register online, please visit the Game On web site at gameonrh.com or inquire by email at cageneral@chailifeline.org.

Caissie Levy is making Canada proud on Broadway

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Caissie Levy describes herself on Twitter as a Canadian New Yorker, which suits her perfectly.

Although the talented performer grew up in Hamilton, Ont., she's been rooted in the Big Apple for more than a decade, because Levy just so happens to be one of Canada's most in-demand exports on Broadway.

The 32-year-old's Broadway credits include leading roles in Hair, Hairspray and last year's Ghost: The Musical. She also starred as the green-skinned Elphaba in the Los Angeles company of Wicked. Despite having lived a good chunk of her life south of the border, Levy says she still misses her native Canada.

"It's funny because I grew up in Hamilton and I moved to New York at 19, so my entire adult life has been in New York," she says. "So I don't know Toronto all that well – like I actually don't know my way around, even though a lot of my friends and family still live there.

"But I miss just Canadianisms in general. I still say 'eh' constantly, so that's like the dead giveaway to Americans… But I miss Tim Hortons, that's something I miss. I miss the general vibe of Canada and Ontario specifically. It's a welcoming place – it's so multicultural."

Both of her parents were singers and musicians, so Levy grew up surrounded by music. As a family, the Levys constantly drove to Toronto from Hamilton to catch the latest musical theatre shows. "Everything we did as a family involved music, so I think from a very early age I always loved singing, I always loved acting, so I got put into those lessons and started doing plays from the time I was eight," she reveals. "Just community theatre things, nothing professional."

The Hamilton native landed her first professional gig – a U.S. national tour of Rent – just a week after graduating acting school, at the tender age of 21. "It was pretty surreal because I grew up worshipping that show, and I actually remember I saw it in Toronto and I was just obsessed," Levy says. "And I couldn't believe what I was seeing, and I just connected so much to the story."

Being on tour introduced her to life on the road and performing every night. "It was a huge honour, and I think, had I realized what a big deal it was at the time, it would have freaked me out," Levy laughs. "But because I was so young and just so excited, I just kind of went with it and jumped into it and had the best time."

Levy made her Broadway debut playing Penny in the Tony Award-winning Hairspray. "I remember as soon as the lights went off I just thought, 'I can't believe I'm on Broadway after all these years of dreaming about it. This came true,'" Levy says. "It was incredible."

She adds: "It was a real blessing because I got to have my big-time Broadway debut in a role that I've been quite comfortable in. So even though I was nervous, I knew I could kind of rely on the fact that it wasn't a brand-new role, which was nice."

Her next major role on Broadway was Sheila in 2009's critically acclaimed revival of Hair. "I've been really fortunate to relate to a lot of my characters on various levels, but I guess if I had to pick the one I relate to the most it would be Sheila in Hair," says Levy. "She's very independent, very outspoken, very passionate and a very emotional person."

The following year, mega producer Cameron Mackintosh brought Hair to London's West End with most of the Broadway cast reprising their roles – including Levy. Near the end of the show's U.K. run, she scored an audition for Ghost: The Musical, a stage adaptation of the Oscar-winning movie. Levy admits she didn't know what to think about the project at first, but after hearing that the original screenwriter was adapting the show and that rock legends Glen Ballard and Dave Stewart were involved, she knew the play was in good hands. Levy eventually scored the gig and got to originate the role of Molly Jensen in the West End in 2011 and on Broadway the following year.

"I was actually travelling with my now-husband at the time I got the job, so we moved back to the U.K. for another year and a half," she says. "And originating the role was another huge honour, a huge learning experience, a huge challenge. Just kind of starting from scratch… and getting the words on the page and then transforming that into a fully realized person without any blueprint. It was very unnerving but so creatively satisfying."

So what's next for the hardworking performer? She's starring in a four-person musical called Murder Ballad, premiering off-Broadway this month. Levy says the immersive nature of the new show is different from anything she's ever done before.

"There's no actual stage," she reveals. "There's actually a bar that's been built in the Union Square Theater. So the audience sits at tables and can order drinks from the bar, which is also part of our set. And the action of the show takes place on their tables, around their tables and chairs, on the bar, up the aisles. So it's really innovative, really in-your-face."

Levy is also looking to nab more film and TV credits. "You know, theatre is my home and I'll always love it, and I'll always want to be on Broadway and off-Broadway and work in theatres around the country. But it's also a hard lifestyle to lead when you're 50 and 60 or when you want to have a child.

"If those things are in my future, it would be nice to get some film work and some television work under my belt just to not have to do eight shows a week. 'Cause that's incredibly tiring," she laughs. "But at this stage of my life, it's wonderful."

אז אני צפונית

טלי מחליטה להבריז לי ולנסוע לה לישראל, אז אני נזכרת בעדי. ידידה חביבה שלי שמשום מה, לא ממש יוצא לנו להיפגש. וזה מוזר, כי היא כל כך אצילית, ולא רכלנית ולא אגוצנטרית. אני די נרגשת מהפגישה.

אני: עדיל"ה, מתוקה שלי! כמה זמן שלא התראנו!

עדי: כן.

אני: חודשים, נכון? נורא התגעגעתי. אז מה קורה איתך? ספרי, ספרי הכל.

עדי: אין חדש.

אני (נזכרת פתאום למה בעצם לא כל כך שמרתי על קשר): לא? איך הילדים?

עדי: בסדר.

אני (היא שתקנית כרונית. היא לא מוציאה יותר משתי מילים למשפט. לכן זכרתי שהיא לא רכלנית ולא אגוצנטרית. על מה נדבר? על מה? אני מתה פה!): ...יופי. אז מה, עדינקה (נו. נו!) אה...איך...איך בעלך המתוק? (המתוק?!)

עדי: כרגיל.

אני (מחניקה התנשפות יאוש): איך הסטרט-אפ שלו? הוא עובד קשה? ככה זה בהתחלה. אני מתארת לעצמי שאת המון לבד עם הילדים, זה בטח לא קל.

עדי: זה בסדר.

אני (מותשת כמו בשיעורי הספורט המפרכים בתיכון. אני ממש מזיעה פה): אז מה את עושה כל היום, קניות ושטויות? בטח לא. את נראית לי דווקא טיפוס של מוזיאונים. זוכרת שפעם הלכנו למוזיאון עם טלי? (אוי טלי אהובתי, מחמל נפשי הקשקשן. איפה את, פטפטנית יפה שלי, חזרי אלי מהטיול בישראל!).

עדי: כן, זוכרת.

אני (טוב אני מזיעה, אני רצוצה, איבדתי את הרצון לחיות, והכל כדי להתעדכן במה היא עושה בזמנה הפנוי. שותקת! שותקת. זה מה שהיא עושה! ניסיון אחרון. אסור בשום אופן לשאול שאלות של - כן או לא. אוקיי): מה דעתך על קיית מידלטון? אגב, שמעתי שהיא חצי יהודיה. את יודעת ששבעים אחוז מהקנדים רוצים שתהיה לה בת? לדעתי יהיה לה בן, מה את אומרת?

טלי: מה זה משנה?

אני (הצלחתי! הצלחתי! היא שאלה אותי שאלה בחזרה. עכשיו אוכל להזיע על תשובה מפורטת): אני מייד אסביר לך מה זה משנה. רק רציתי לומר לך שאני נורא שמחה שנפגשנו לקפה, ושחייבים לעשות את זה לעיתים יותר קרובות!

עדי: לא בטוח. האמת היא...שאת מדברת המון, זה קצת מייגע...

אני (עשר מילים ברצף! עשר! יש סיכוי. יש עתיד. מזל שלא התיאשתי!)

The CJN's French-language reporter in Montreal, Elias Levy, writes about:

Historian Edgar Feuchtwanger who talks about his experience growing up with Adolph Hitler as his neighbour, the subject he addresses in his latest book.

The Montreal Museum of Fine Arts has restituted a valuable Nazi-looted artwork that has been in its collection since 1969 to the descendants of the German Jewish family that owned it before World War II.

Radio-Canada issued a correction to a report by its Middle East correspondent for her use of the word "attack" in referring to the Mavi Marmara incident two years ago.

Leaning over a table for an hour-long interview at the offices of Les Actualités, the weekly Côte des Neiges-based newspaper he has overseen for the last 25 years, Victor Afriat does not seem as busy as he actually is. Yet, in reality, Afriat never stops much. At age 67 (this month), the Moroccan-born and Paris-raised Afriat, along with a staff of nine, publishes one of the most successful biweekly – and bilingual – newspapers in the city.

Have you met holy?

Parshat Kedoshim, which we read a couple of weeks ago, tells the Jewish People how to be holy.

First, it states, be holy because "I [God] am holy." Then the Torah goes through a litany of instructions on how to be holy, the first one being honouring your father and mother. Other instructions include respecting the aged and loving thy neighbour, as well as directives less predicated on interaction between people, such as the prohibition against tattooing your body.

What is it to be holy? What is the pursuit all about? Do you know when you're in the presence of a holy person?

I might know some holy people. They are not self-evident, mostly, and Judaism is slow to call someone holy. Rabbi Judah the Prince is called Rabbeinu Hakadosh, for example, but that title is rare. But the people I consider holy don't gossip, or do so very infrequently. Lashon harah – gossiping – is very unholy. They don't embarrass others, particularly in public. The Talmud says that embarrassing someone publicly is like killing them. They don't waste time, and even when they are silly and fanciful, the holy people I know are filled with elation and laugh like a youngster. For them, silliness is learning, just as everything else is.

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

If I'm right and these people are indeed holy, one of my rules is to say little when I'm around them. Rather, I try to listen closely and ask appropriate questions. I am quieter, because they make me know how little I know.

Furthermore, holy people seem to have a type of clarity that they often preface with self-doubt, like, "But when we speak about life, so much of it is uncertain, so it's hard to say."

To me, that doubt might prove their holiness, as there seems to be something more authentic and genuine in doubt than in certainty. We all have family or friends who talk incessantly. Sometimes they're insightful and other times they speak as if fact-checking is obsolete. They don't give you a moment to consider the value of their statements and ideas. Holy women, men and children don't yammer. They like nothing more than to attach themselves to a colourful idea with dimension and facets, but their words are measured like flour for a cake, and more often than not, they make a lot of sense.

I don't know if the people I'm thinking of are holy or not. They do everything they can to reject admiration. It annoys and embarrasses them. And they do have personality blemishes, despite a cultural and religious belief, or desire, that the holy be without pockmarks of character.

I would say the opposite. The holy seem to suffer a lot from angst, and while their happy times are like cool water, you know they know about the endless suffering in the world. This angst can create intimacy challenges and a plethora of other social and personal challenges. Avraham, Yitzchak, Ya'akov, Sarah, Rivkah, Rachel and Leah weren't perfect. The holy are scarred.

God tells us to be holy. He shows us the road to holiness, including, "Ve'ahavta l'raycha kamocha" – "love your neighbor as you love yourself." But holy never lets us know for sure if it's there. Humility is sewn into holiness, as is anguish and anger.

Those whom I believe to be holy may not be, and those whom I look at dubiously may be one of the 39 righteous in all generations. Or not.

Netanyahu lands in China

Effort underway to rescue The CJN

CJN Staff

TORONTO — The board of directors of The CJN has launched an all-out effort to save the print edition of the newspaper.

In response to the "outpouring of concern and the expressions of support," as mentioned by CJN president Donald Carr in his note to readers on May 2, the board last week appointed one of its members, Marty Goldberg, a well-known community activist and philanthropist in Toronto, to be its "chief rescue officer" leading the overall effort to save the print editions in both Toronto and Montreal.

Stanley Plotnick, a past president of Federation CJA in Montreal and Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA, will work with Goldberg specifically in relation to the Montreal edition.

Over the past years, the paper had outperformed most other print media in stanching relative revenue declines. Despite far-reaching cost-control measures undertaken by management and policies that minimized the erosion in advertising revenue, the paper could not withstand the negative impact of digital advertising on print media.

To our readers

Since my message in The CJN's May 2 edition regarding the future of the paper, the board of directors has continued to work diligently, and there are substantial positive developments that have taken place. You will see the story elsewhere in this edition.

Some committed members of the community have agreed to provide part of our required financing. Others are being contacted. We are optimistic – though not yet sure – that we will be able to obtain what we need to achieve our goal of maintaining a Canadian Jewish News print newspaper, including a viable publication for Montreal, as well as strengthening the Internet edition.

In addition, it will be essential that our advertisers stay the course and that our subscribers assist. If we are to be successful, practicality dictates that it will be necessary for us to increase subscription rates to a realistic level immediately.

Many of you have told us, by telephone, by email, by letters and face to face, that you will gladly pay an increase. It would be your contribution to the well-being of The CJN – your paper.

It is also critical that we increase the number of subscribers, and we plan to embark on a campaign to achieve that.

We are working against the clock, but we are determined that we must succeed for the sake of the community.

Ex-CJNer Honoured

SUDBURY, Ont. — Former CJN reporter and columnist Laura Stricker, 26, won the Larry Smith Award for novice reporting at the Ontario Newspaper Awards in Waterloo, Ont., April 27. The Sudbury Star reporter, who was a CJN staff reporter and What's New columnist, won for three stories: a profile of Sudbury's small Jewish community, a piece about an abusive school bus driver, and a story on firefighting in Sudbury. Another ex-CJN staffer, Rita Poliakov, 25, the Star's former police reporter, was a finalist for spot news coverage of the Elliott Lake mall disaster.

Natives Visit Israel

WINNIPEG — Ron Evans, chief of the Norway House Cree Nation in Manitoba, led his second annual youth leadership development mission to Israel April 29 to May 6. Under the auspices of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, the 30 young people studied Israeli culture and society, visited Christian and Jewish holy sites, studied immigrant absorption, and skated on the ice rink at the Canada Centre in Metulla. The band raised funds for the trip through initiatives, such as a golf tournament, silent auctions, a raffle and pancake breakfasts. Evans hopes to run the trips for 10 years.

WORLD

Fraud Arrest

LOS ANGELES — The FBI arrested a Los Angeles man who allegedly operated a Ponzi scheme targeting the city's Iranian Jews. Shervin Davatgarzadeh, also known as Shervin Neman, was arrested last month on suspicion of defrauding $3 million from mostly Jewish Iranian-American investors. Police allege he posed as a hedge-fund manager promising to invest in Los Angeles real estate. He's suspected of illegally using the investments to pay for a lavish lifestyle that included jewelry and luxury cars.

Record Auction

NEW YORK — An auction of the 500-piece Judaica collection owned by philanthropist Michael Steinhardt was the "most valuable auction of Judaica ever held," Sotheby's said. The April 29 auction of nearly the entire collection brought in some $8.5 million, exceeding presale estimates by $6 million. The Israel Museum and New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art jointly bought a medieval text of Maimonides' Mishneh Torah for an undisclosed amount that was more than the $2.9 million it sold for in 1989.

Mom Sues Cosmetic Firm Over Ad Claim

NEW YORK — An Orthodox Jewish woman is suing Lancome cosmetics, claiming its 24-hour makeup does not last as long as advertised and thus prevents her from looking good all Shabbat.

In her lawsuit, Rorie Weisberg of Monsey, N.Y., said Lancome's Teint Idole Ultra 24H foundation does not last 24 hours and that the company is practising false advertising, a violation of New York State business law, the New York Post reported.

Weisberg's lawsuit says her son is having a bar mitzvah next month and that she tried the Lancome foundation in advance to see if she could look good in her makeup for the entire 25-hour celebration. According to Halachah, makeup cannot be removed and replaced during the Sabbath.

"The 24-hour claim was central to plaintiff's purchase decision, as a long-lasting makeup assists with her dual objectives of compliance with religious law and enhancement to her natural appearance," the suit says. The suit seeks unspecified damages from Lancome and its parent firm, L'Oreal, for Weisberg and other makeup purchasers, as well as a "corrective advertising campaign."

L'Oreal said the lawsuit has no merit and that Lancome stands behind its products and will fight it.

Canada House to serve diverse community

Community centre dedicated in Jerusalem

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Dignitaries from the government of Canada and the municipality of Jerusalem gathered in Jerusalem last week to dedicate "Canada House," a community centre funded largely with donations from Canadian Jews.

Located in the Morasha neighbourhood of Jerusalem, Canada House will serve a diverse population with programming geared to young people, recent immigrants, the elderly and other local residents. The $4-million refurbishment is a project of the Jerusalem Foundation, a non-profit organization with a branch in Canada.

"Canada House will be dedicated to the many Canadians who share the values of coexistence, culture and community with the Jerusalem Foundation. The newly established Canada House will also recognize and honour the warm friendship of Canada towards the city of Jerusalem and her diverse population," the Jerusalem Foundation in Canada (JFIC) stated in a news release.

We will not keep silent

From the editor's desk...

At the core of the moral, legal, historical and emotional absurdity of referring to the eastern portion of Jerusalem as occupied territory is the term's insidious, malevolent separation of the Jewish People from the only remnant of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem.

The only time in history that Jews did not live in the eastern portion of Jerusalem – the Old City – was the 19-year period between Israel's War of Independence in 1948 and The Six Day War in 1967.

The proposal by the United Nations in 1947 to partition British Mandatory Palestine into an Arab and Jewish state did not encompass the city of Jerusalem. The United Nations proposed a special set of rules for Jerusalem, namely, that it become a uniquely internationalized city.

The Jews of Mandatory Palestine acceded to the plan for partition. They did not accede to the plan for Jerusalem.

The Arabs of Mandatory Palestine acceded neither to the plan for partition nor to the plan for Jerusalem. Nor did the Arab countries of the Arab League accept either of the plans.

They could not abide even a sliver of land in their midst where the Jews would be sovereign.

The Arab world did not wait for the British to quit Palestine before attacking the Jews. With the exhortation of the Nazi Haj Amin Husseini, the Mufti of Jerusalem, to kill the Jews still ringing in their ears, Arab fighters launched their war of genocide against the Palestinian Jews, even as the votes for partition were being counted by the members of the UN General Assembly.

Having rejected the compromise of partition and the idea of coexistence with the Jews, the Arabs also failed in their violent attempt to make the partition plan a moot point. The Jews defeated the charging Arab irregular forces of Palestine and the armed forces of the surrounding Arab states.

When the armistice that ended the fighting in 1949 was proclaimed, King Abdullah of Jordan was in control of what we call the West Bank (of the Jordan River), included in which was east Jerusalem and the Old City of Jerusalem and the Western Wall of the Second Temple.

It was always King Abdullah's intention to add the West Bank to his own Hashemite Kingdom of Transjordan. Apart from Great Britain, no other country thought this was a good idea. Ironically, for the sake of a tranquil border with Jordan, Israel might have acquiesced in that armistice configuration, had Abdullah's grandson, Hussein, not joined in the fighting against the Jewish state in 1967. Despite the pleas of the Israeli government to stay out of the war, the young King Hussein attacked at various points along his border with his 19-year-old western neighbour. Notably, Jordanian snipers fired across the no-man's land separating east from west Jerusalem.

On June 7, 1967 (the 28th day of Iyar), the last day of the fighting of the Six Day War, Israel recaptured the Old City in east Jerusalem. The army of the sovereign Jewish state had returned to the Old City, to the Western Wall.

Jews from all walks of life and from all corners of the world were also about to return there, where they had always been, except for those 19 years prior to 1967.

We celebrate that day of reunification as Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day).

It is not a celebration of sanctimonious self-righteousness. It is not a celebration of malice or hatred toward others. It is simply a celebration of touching and holding and cherishing the fulfilment of a promise.

In his masterful work Israel: An Echo of Eternity, the late, beloved theologian and scholar Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel elegiacally expresses the religious, historical, emotional essence of the Jewish People's connection to Jerusalem.

"For more than 3,000 years we have been in love with Jerusalem," he writes. "She occupied our hearts, filled our prayers, pervaded our dreams. Continually mourning her loss, our grief was not subdued when celebrating festivities, when arranging a dinner table, when painting our homes. No meal was concluded without imploring: "Build Jerusalem speedily in your own days..." (He writes so much more. It is absolutely imperative reading.)

To be sure, there is indeed a great deal to discuss regarding all aspects of coexistence arrangements in eastern Jerusalem and the Old City between Palestinians and Israelis. But to say that eastern Jerusalem and the Old City and, of course, the Western Wall are occupied territory is absurd to the point of grotesque.

This point must be made over and over again. And we must teach it to our children so that they – and we – will be entirely resolute with this truth.

The prophet Isaiah would have wanted us to feel this way too. As he once spoke and wrote, "For Zion's sake I will not keep silent/ And for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest."

We must not allow Israel's enemies to separate truth from history.

Happy Jerusalem Day. –MBD

THE PRESIDENT AND THE POPE

During a visit last week to the Vatican, Israeli President Shimon Peres invited Pope Francis to visit Israel. The Pope accepted the invitation "with willingness and joy," a Vatican spokesperson said, but there was no indication when a trip would be made. "I am expecting you in Jerusalem, not just me but the whole country of Israel," Peres told the Pope after 30 minutes of private talks in the Vatican's Apostolic Palace.

Quality In Everything We Do

May is Jewish Heritage Month in Ontario

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The history of Ontario Jews provides insight into all immigrant groups in Canada, according to Irving Abella.

The author, historian and York University professor shared his thoughts on Ontario and Canadian Jewry as keynote speaker for the launch of the province's second annual Jewish Heritage Month at Toronto's Lipa Green Centre April 30.

Dara Solomon, director of the 40-year-old Ontario Jewish Archives, said she was excited to be launching a new photo exhibition titled Being Jewish in Ontario: A Pictorial Celebration.

The exhibit was co-organized by the Ontario Jewish Archives and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). It focuses on five aspects: community builders, culture and leisure, ritual and observance, teaching and learning, and tikkun olam.

It will be on display at 10 venues over the month, including several public libraries, Jewish community centres and Vaughan City Hall. Other events during the month include walking tours, talks, performances, and a series of exhibits at Baycrest.

Abella said Jewish students know next to nothing about the history of Jews in Canada. "That is a shame, because it's fascinating, colourful, important, and deserves to be known."

He suggested that the Jewish community's greatest contribution to the province may have been that it "paved the path for the culturally diverse society we have become."

Ontario is the first "and hopefully not the last" province to celebrate Jewish Heritage Month, said Joel Reitman, a board member of both UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and CIJA. May is also Jewish American Heritage Month in the United States.

Eglinton-Lawrence Liberal MPP Mike Colle, the driving force behind Bill 17, which declared Jewish Heritage Month and was passed in February 2012, said he grew up in a Jewish area at College and Grace streets. His mother did piecework on Spadina Avenue and later was employed by a high-end Jewish tailor for 25 years.

Colle, a former history teacher with an Italian family background but a passion for Jewish history, reflected on the accomplishments of Jews across Ontario.

"We've got to make sure these stories are not forgotten," he said.

He cited as one example the late David Goldberg, a Hamilton lawyer and former RCAF pilot in World War II who was shot down over France. Goldberg walked back to England, signed up to fight again, and flew more than 235 missions in all.

Thornhill Tory MPP Peter Shurman, who co-sponsored Bill 17 with Colle and MPP Cheri Di Novo, said that his riding is home to the largest Jewish community in the province, he said.

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the federation, spoke of the Jewish community's "fervent desire to build community together."

Multiculturalism is the legacy of the early immigrants, Abella said. "If they could become fully Canadian and yet maintain their unique identity… then any minority could."

But the Jewish presence in Canada goes back at least 250 years, almost to the beginning of European settlement, Abella said.

In the War of 1812, every single Jew of military age enlisted to fight off the invading Americans, he noted. Among them were the first Jews in the British Empire to become officers.

The 1840s marked a high point in Jewish life in the province, with no restrictions, quotas or antisemitism, he said.

But Abella cautioned against romanticizing the past, citing a history of quotas, restrictions and antisemitism in the middle of the 20th century.

"It changed at the end of World War II with the help of sympathetic politicians and courts."

Ontario was the first province to adopt anti-discrimination laws in housing, he added.

Speaker's venue shifted after police visit rabbi

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The U.S. woman at the centre of a controversy that saw a synagogue cancel her speaking engagement is warning Canadians to be vigilant over police infringement of free speech.

Pamela Geller, who was slated to speak May 13 at the Chabad @ Flamingo Synagogue accused York Region Police (YRP) of "enforcing sharia [Islamic] law. That's what this is, that under blasphemy laws you cannot criticize or offend Islam. That's shocking."

Meir Weinstein

Geller is executive director of Stop Islamification of America, which opposes construction of a mosque near Ground Zero in New York. The group has also sponsored anti-jihad advertisements in subways and buses. Her critics accuse her of Islamophobia.

Last week, Insp. Ricky Veerappan, head of YRP's diversity, equity and inclusion section, along with members of the force's hate crimes unit, visited Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo, at the synagogue. The Jewish Defence League (JDL) had rented space in the synagogue for the event.

Veerappan said police told the rabbi they would reconsider his position as a volunteer chaplain with the force if the event went ahead as planned.

Veerappan did not respond to a request from The CJN for an interview and Rabbi Kaplan declined to comment. In a news release, YRP stated, "Free speech is the right of every citizen and YRP recognizes that. However, some of Ms. Geller's previous comments clearly conflict with the values of our organization and our continuous work to enhance relationships in all our diverse communities.

"Rabbi Kaplan's connection to Ms. Geller's event posed a concern for YRP as it would put our organization in conflict with our long-held position of inclusivity.

"Rabbi Kaplan decided to cancel Ms. Geller's appearance as it would place him in conflict with the values of our organization, which support a safe, welcoming and inclusive community for all."

Geller, however, said there is nothing in the record that would warrant police interference in a matter of public policy which should be protected by the right to free speech.

"There is a global jihad. We're not allowed to talk about it?" she asked.

Geller said some "Islamic-supremacist groups have tried to stop her in the United States. That's not new. What's new is law enforcement [doing it]. That's the really big difference."

Geller said the visit by police "intimidated" Rabbi Kaplan. "Religious leaders are not equipped to deal with that."

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan

Geller, who publishes the AtlasShrugs.com blog site, questioned Veerappan's statement that her presence would contradict the YRP's values. She said she speaks against gender apartheid, ethnic apartheid and Jew-hatred. "What exactly are his values?"

JDL director Meir Weinstein said the synagogue "caved in" to police intimidation. At worst, he said, police should have attended the lecture to see for themselves if there were any violations of the law.

Responding to the incident, columnist Salim Mansur published an open letter to YRP Chief Eric Jolliffe.

"I am appalled that in this day and age we continue to hear regularly how the liberal democratic tradition of Canada and the West is being systematically shredded by institutions sworn to protect it," he wrote.

"I submit your intentions might very well be of some merit as a guardian of law and order. But those pushing for preventing Ms. Geller from speaking by putting pressure on Rabbi Kaplan to deny the use of his synagogue for holding her event are people I know very well. These are people, Muslims as I am, who come from cultures that have no respect for individual rights and freedoms enshrined in our constitution, and while making home here in Canada have no respect for the culture of this country," Mansur added.

"They need to learn the culture of a free society, of a society that is open to debates and discussions however painful this might be to someone else's sensibilities. But if you concede to their demands, all that you would be doing is indulging them, heeding their wishes and threats, and slowly, intentionally or not, bending Canada's tradition in the direction of the ruined cultures of these people which they have brought with them and want to push into our society."

Geller's speaking engagement was shifted to the Toronto Zionist Centre.

It will mark her first visit to Toronto.

"What a welcome wagon," she said.

Jerusalem Day

Last week, in the Morasha district of downtown Jerusalem, a group of Canadians attended the dedication of a newly renovated community centre that will be a hub for social, educational and cultural services for all of the residents in the area.

The centre has been called Canada House by the Jerusalem Foundation, the non-profit agency started by the late former mayor of the city, Teddy Kollek, that spearheaded the project. The name attests to the fact that Canadian philanthropists have been the catalysts for the project and instrumental in providing its funding. (Please see the story on page 3)

It is fitting that the dedication of the new centre occurred merely days prior to Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day), the day set aside to commemorate and celebrate the reunification of east and west Jerusalem, the Old City with the new city, on the 28th day of Iyar, June 7, 1967.

The Jordanian army had expelled the Jewish community from the Old City 19 years earlier, during Israel's War of Independence, and brutishly tried to destroy all vestiges of Jewish life and history there. Synagogues were destroyed; burial places were desecrated. Disfiguring barbed wire fences cut the city into its two parts. Large, ugly cement slabs blocked any movement between the areas.

The barbed wire was taken down and the cement blocks were removed 46 years ago. The city was physically, geographically and municipally reunited. Since then, its modernization and beautification have continued unabated.

As poets, songwriters and travel writers have noted, Jerusalem is a golden city of unique, arresting beauty.

Its diverse peoples fill the streets with the sounds of movement, commerce, music, laughter, learning, discourse, argument and shouting.

But despite the city's sheer physical beauty, it aches and throbs with intra-communal tensions – Jew against Jew – and inter-societal tensions – Jew against Arab.

The city is not yet fully at peace, although that is our dream and our hope.

And that is partially why the Canada House project is so worthy of our commendation. It will become a meeting place where Jews and Arabs, haredi and non-haredi Jews, will come together to advance and improve their own respective lives. In the process they will meet each other. They will talk to each other. They may even befriend each other.

The millennial dream of the Jewish return to Zion has been fulfilled.

The millennial aspiration of Zion's restoration, however, is still unfinished. In truth, in a real and symbolic way, it must always be thus if we are to allow each generation through eternity to add its measure of love and devotion to that wondrous place.

Despite the ongoing task that remains, on the 46th celebration of Yom Yerushalayim, we shall take the prophet's words to heart and celebrate. "Rejoice with Jerusalem, and be glad for her all you who love her."

25 years ago in The CJN

World Jewish Congress president Edgar Bronfman told a Montreal audience that Palestinians in the West Bank could have autonomy under a "loose confederation" with Israel rather than Jordan. He thought Palestinians would prefer such a link because of Israel's democratic freedoms, its better salaries and its beaches.

Jewish Heritage Month

On behalf of the government of Ontario, it is my distinct pleasure to extend warm greetings to everyone marking Jewish Heritage Month.

I feel privileged to be premier of a province rooted in diversity, one of our government's core values. It is our differences that unite us and that define us as a vibrant, caring and inclusive society. I am proud of the Jewish Canadian community – and of the countless ways you continue to enrich our province and make it an even better place for people of every background to live.

I am honoured to join you in marking the second official Jewish Heritage Month, following the passage in the legislature of the Jewish Heritage Month Act, 2012. This is a time for reflection on the past and on the immense obstacles your community has overcome. But, even more importantly, it is a time to rejoice in your remarkable triumphs – and to look with optimism to the promise of an even brighter future for Jewish Canadians, people of great courage and resiliency.

Please accept my very best wishes for a Jewish Heritage Month that is both memorable and uplifting – a true celebration of your community's inspirational contributions to Ontario.

Youngest rabbi at Beth Torah

I would like to wish a hearty mazal tov to Beth Torah Congregation in Toronto on its 50th anniversary (Shuls celebrate special anniversaries, April 18). However, I would like to mention that although Rabbi Yossi Sapirman is one of the youngest rabbis in the shul's history, there was a rabbi younger than him. My late uncle, Rabbi Solomon Z. Domb, became rabbi of Beth Torah at the tender age of 23, although his 6-foot-3 large-framed stature may have made him appear to be older than he actually was. He served not only as the shul's rabbi but also as its chazzan. My uncle was a child prodigy and received his Orthodox smichah in New York, in addition to studying chazzanut under the personal guidance of world-renowned Cantor David Koussevitzky. He had a wonderful strong tenor voice that I greatly miss to this day. He became the rabbi and cantor at Beth Torah in 1975 and served until 1980. He then went on to become chazzan at Beth Tikvah Synagogue for a short period of time until he started his own synagogue, the first and only of its kind in Thornhill, B'nai Shalom North Congregation.

Rabbi Kelman's visionary concept

The loss of The CJN is a huge loss. Over the past two years, Rabbi Jay Kelman, in his column, has alerted us to perhaps the most critical need facing our community today: the threat to Jewish continuity. His columns detail the enormous financial burden on parents of Jewish day school students and what this means for our future. His visionary concept of "Birthright Education" is imaginative and brilliant. He proposes pragmatic solutions to make this education eventually self-sustaining. In the column "Four questions about Jewish education" (April 4), Rabbi Kelman challenges us all to address this now, before a generation is lost. In time, it may benefit many communities around the globe. But we need to start here and now. This is a project truly worthy of our time and effort.

The CJN feels like home

I am so sad to hear that The CJN is planning to stop publishing! It has been a staple in my life for so many years, a Jewish Canadian institution. Our family would always look forward to reading it each Shabbat. I have always found the paper to be replete with fascinating articles and columns. I could always read it and find mention of the schools, institutions, shuls and people that have been a part of my emotional landscape for my entire life. Where else could you read columns from your high school history teacher, university professor and rabbi alongside reports about the important issues affecting the Jewish world? I read a good Jewish paper in New York, but for me, The CJN will always feel like home.

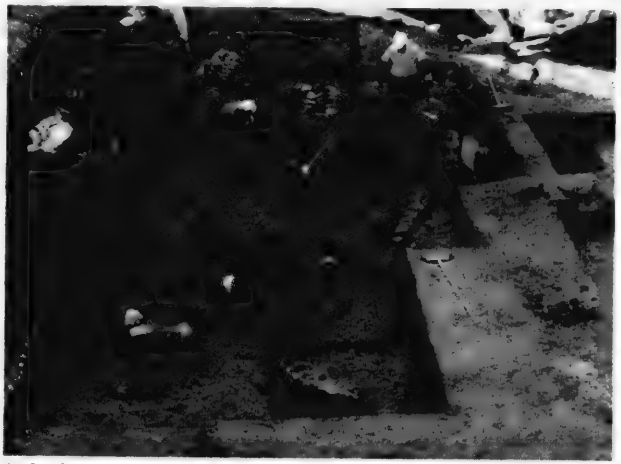
Archeological discoveries reveal Jerusalem's history

Yom Yerushalyim, Jerusalem Day, 28th day of Iyar

Judy Lash Balint
JNS.org

Tens of thousands visit the Old City on Jerusalem Day, May 8 this year, the anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem during the 1967 Six Day War. While celebrations go on above ground, new excavations underneath and around the Old City are being uncovered and opened to the public, peeling back layers of history and expanding understanding of events in the centre of the Jewish universe.

Old City expert Rabbi Barnea Selevan, a veteran licensed tour guide and co-director of Foundation Stone, which explores and shares Israel's heritage, is excited about a series of archeological digs taking place in the vicinity of the Western Wall. For the past several years, the Western Wall Heritage Foundation has sponsored excavations at the back of the plaza, and workers have uncovered part of a Roman colonnaded street dating back to the second century CE.



Archeologists and workers from the Israel Antiquities Authority excavate ruins in the Old City of Jerusalem from the Second Temple period. [IAA photo]

But what was ignored until recently, Rabbi Selevan says, are several small stone buildings, overgrown and blocked by material from the dig.

"When I look down from the street in front of the Chabad building several levels above the site, those old walls are the most exciting thing I see," Rabbi Selevan told JNS.org. "There's no question they're from First Temple times."

Seals from the Temple were found nearby. The walls, according to some archeologists, are from homes that were abandoned but not destroyed by the Roman onslaught on Jerusalem in 70 CE.

Rabbi Selevan noted that the streets exposed at the back of the plaza lead to the Temple Mount in the Robinson's Arch area and provide evidence that the Romans stayed in Jerusalem and used the Temple Mount during the early Roman period.

Plans call for further excavations underneath the plaza and then to open the underground area, much as the Western Wall tunnels have been open to the public since the 1990s. Rabbi Selevan said excavations are continuing in the tunnel area too, and beautiful rooms with ornate capitols from First and Second Temple times are being prepared to be open to the public.

In today's Jewish Quarter above the Western Wall Plaza, Rabbi Selevan described the "delicious" discovery of a "fancy Roman bathhouse" two stories underground on Ha'omer Street, which was found in the course of construction of a new mikvah (ritual bath) for men. "In all likelihood, the bathhouse was used by the Roman 10th Legion – the same guys who thought they were wiping out the Jews," he said.

Yuval Baruch, Jerusalem district archeologist at the Israel Antiquities Authority, says that despite the extensive archeological excavations in the Jewish Quarter, not even one building has been discovered there so far that belonged to the Roman legion.

"The absence of such a find led to the conclusion that Aelia Capitolina, the Roman city established after the destruction of Jerusalem, was small and limited in area," he told JNS.org.

"The new find, together with other discoveries of recent years, shows that the city was considerably larger than we previously estimated," Baruch said. "Information about Aelia Capitolina is extremely valuable and can contribute greatly to research on Jerusalem because it was that city that determined the character and general appearance of ancient Jerusalem and [the city's appearance] as we know it today. The shape of the city has determined the outline of its walls and the location of the gates to this very day."

The trauma of the Roman plunder of Jerusalem is heavily evidenced at several locations in the City of David, located a few hundred yards from the Western Wall to the southeast of the Dung Gate.

Aharon Horowitz, director of Megalim, the Institute of Jerusalem Studies of the City of David, points out that the drainage channel under the Herodian-era street in what is known as the Pilgrims Ascent area of the City of David was used by Jews hiding from the Romans. A Roman sword was found in the channel.

According to University of Haifa archeologist Ronny Reich, who has worked in the area for decades, the smashed paving stones indicate that the Romans broke through the street to the channel below to drag out the Jews who tried to flee toward the Kidron Valley in the last days of the siege.

Over the past year, the ascent has been opened and visitors can walk along the Herodian Road to the southern wall excavations at The Jerusalem Archaeological Park - Davidson Center.

Across the road from the City of David Visitors Center is the Givati Parking Lot site, the largest archeological excavation in Jerusalem. "Every day there are new finds here," Horowitz told JNS.org. "There are remains here of every strata of Jerusalem history."

One of the most magnificent is the floor of a building considered by some experts to be the first-century palace of Queen Helena of Adiabene, who converted to Judaism. A huge Roman mansion from the third century was also uncovered in the former parking lot, and hundreds of Roman and Byzantine artifacts have been unearthed inside, including a gold earring inlaid with pearls and stones. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently chose a facsimile of the earrings to present to American First Lady Michelle Obama when she visited Israel with her husband.

Besides the digs and excavations below today's city, significant conservation and restoration have been completed on the Old City walls in recent years. Over the past six years, the Jerusalem Development Company, the Prime Minister's Office and the Israel Antiquities Authority have spruced up and restored all four kilometres of the city walls built in the 16th century by Sultan Suleiman, and all seven gates of the Old City. The last time any rehabilitation work was done on the walls was in the 1920s, during the British Mandate period.

A tiny, button-sized object of fired clay stamped with a two-line Aramaic inscription meaning "Pure for God" is one of the most intriguing archeological finds of recent years in Israel.

Last October, a delegation from the Jewish National Fund of Canada dedicated a park containing a restoration of the grounds in front of a stretch of the Old City wall, south of Jaffa Gate.

At the ceremony, Shuka Dorfman, head of the Israel Antiquities Authority noted, "These impressive walls attest to the building and destruction of seven different regimes, and include remnants from the First Temple Period. Our preservation activities concentrated on the park's main promenade and on the antiquities along the wall."

Today, visitors can walk along an accessible path along the wall between Jaffa Gate and Zion Gate, touch the ancient stones, and peer into the small caves dotted along the base of the wall.

Other discoveries of a much smaller nature will end up in museum displays, but still tell a story about Jewish life in Temple times. A tiny, button-sized object of fired clay stamped with a two-line Aramaic inscription is one of the most intriguing finds of recent years.

According to archeologists Eli Shukron of the IAA and Ronny Reich, the meaning of the inscription is "Pure for God." Like a modern-day kashrut seal, the object was probably used to mark products or objects that were brought to the Temple and had to be ritually pure.

"This stamped impression is probably the kind referred to in the Mishnah," Shukron said. "To the best of our knowledge, this is the first time that such an object or anything similar to it was discovered in an archeological excavation, and it constitutes direct archeological evidence of the activity on the Temple Mount and the workings of the Temple during the Second Temple period."

Culinary comforts on Yom Yerushalayim

I tasted my first artichoke in Jerusalem when I was 19. I had a yerushalmi boyfriend who decided to cook dinner for me. The first course was artichokes, with a lemony dipping sauce. I had never seen an artichoke before. Sitting on my plate, round and spiky, it looked both forbidding and inviting. It seemed to me some sort of ossified exotic flower (which, as it happens, it would have become, if allowed to continue growing on its stem instead of being harvested for sale in a Jerusalem market). I didn't know how to approach it.

My host demonstrated. He tore off an outer leaf, dipped in a lemony sauce, placed the bottom of the leaf between his teeth, scraping off the soft inner part as he pulled the leaf from his mouth. Barbaric, but also, somehow, elegant. I tried it. I had never tasted anything like it. I was hooked. I loved the taste, but also the ritual of peeling off layer after layer, revealing leaves that were increasingly tender. If you, too, are a fan of artichokes, then you've also contended with the nastiness of the choke – the hard and sharp fibres at the centre that guard the delectable heart.

The yerushalmi and I eventually parted ways, but a lifelong love of artichokes was forged.

I sometimes imagine that the forbidden fruit in Eden (which Europeans imagine as an apple and some midrashim identify as a fig) was an artichoke – although I know the artichoke is not a tree fruit at all, but a kind of flowering thistle. Still, somehow the slow and deliberate act of stripping off leaf after leaf in pursuit of the tender heart, negotiating the spiky choke along the way, seems to me an apt metaphor for the acquisition of knowledge or of love, both of which are implicated in the edenic story.

The artichoke is native to the Mediterranean region and popular in Italian and French cuisines. I have eaten, cooked and served artichokes in many places. Perhaps because of where I first encountered it, and perhaps because its combination of prickliness and tenderness dovetails with the metaphor of the Sabra, I can never eat one without thinking of Jerusalem.

(The misnamed Jerusalem artichoke, of course, is neither an artichoke nor a Jerusalem cultivar, but a tuber native to North America. Like the artichoke, it is a relative of the sunflower, or girasola in Italian, which morphed into the Jerusalem of its name.)

Culinary memories, the chain of associations that come with foods, capture the crosscurrents of flavours that migrate with people, taking on new nuances, and attaching themselves to evolving ideas of such things as identity, family, peoplehood and relationships.

Many of my friends have been cooking their way through Jerusalem, a tantalizing new cookbook by Jerusalem-born

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Yotam Ottolenghi and Sammi Tamimi, two chefs who have electrified London cuisine. Tapping ther respective Jewish and Muslim culinary traditions, in their introduction, they refer to the "flavours and smells" of their native Jerusalem as their "mother tongue," the foundational culinary grammar that undergirds the cuisine they develop. "We imagine them and dream in them... They define comfort for us, excitement, joy, serene bliss."

Perhaps it's superficial or trivial to focus on foods in the context of Yom Yerushalayim. But I don't think so. Food memories are potent. We celebrate and mourn with foods, use them to solidify the ties of friendship and family. There is something especially powerful in sharing and melding food cultures.

Food is, after all, our first nurturance. On my own university campus, the shared food cultures and religious overlap between kashrut and halal have turned our kosher cafeteria into a space that both Jewish and Muslim students find inviting.

It would be naive to suggest that food can bring peace. But there is something elemental about cooking and feeding and sharing that fosters community. We could start with the prickly artichoke. You must take your time and show patience in eating it. And, after all, even the forbidding choke hiding in the centre of the leaves, under the right conditions, could blossom into a flower.

A morning with Women of the Wall

Though I spend much time in Jerusalem I never pray at the Western Wall – for religious reasons. The reflection by the late Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, one of the great Jewish teachers of the 20th century, that Judaism has holy events, not holy places, resonates with me.

In view of its history, the Western Wall is most effective as a symbol of national rebirth. Thus, for example, I was greatly moved when, a couple of years ago, I attended my grandson's swearing in as an IDF soldier there. The fact that it has been turned into a shrine over which haredim claim hegemony and which others legitimately challenge is another sign of the lethal mixture of religion and politics that bedevils Israeli public life.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Lately, the group Women of the Wall – with members across much of the Jewish denominational spectrum – has claimed equal access to worship there. Seeking to revive the Jewish tradition of Rosh Chodesh, the new moon, as a special day of celebration for women, they assemble every month in the women's enclosure of the Wall to conduct their own services.

Many ultra-Orthodox Jews are up in arms. Contrary to what they consider to be Jewish law, women are heard singing, some don tallitot and a few even put on tfillin. Jerusalem police have until now used a legal provision that allowed them to prevent such "sacrilege" by arresting participants.

In order to show my 12-year-old granddaughter on a visit from England the charade, and to "smuggle" her aunt's – the soldier's mother's – tallit (which might otherwise have been taken from her at the security barrier), I broke my rule and spent the morning of Rosh Chodesh Iyar (April 11) at the Wall. I stood on the plaza behind the women's section with many other men to express my commitment to gender equality in Judaism.

It was a less than edifying experience. Haredim were shouting across the barrier in an effort to disrupt the women's prayers. Cameras, many in the hands of journalists, dominated the scene.

The previous day, Natan Sharansky, the chairman of the Jewish Agency, whom Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had charged with finding a solution to the impasse, unveiled a much-publicized plan to American Jewish leaders purporting to give all streams what they want by creating a third section to the south of the present enclosures where women and men could worship together, non-Orthodox style.

A former staffer in the prime minister's office has recently written that Netanyahu finds it very difficult to make decisions. To avoid annoying the ultra-Orthodox on the one hand and disappointing Israel's American-Jewish backers on the other, he may have chosen to outsource the problem to Sharansky. The latter, conscious of the egalitarian sensitivities of American donors, is now seeking a way to appease them with a non-solution.

The fact that, despite the media hype, neither haredim nor liberals have persuasively objected to Sharansky's proposal suggests they know that it won't fly. Archeologists and engineers have already expressed misgivings about it, and the Muslim Waqf, responsible for the Temple Mount, is bound to seek to disrupt it. But the public seems to be weary of the whole issue and thus keen to hail any ruse as a solution.

However, even in the unlikely event that it works, the proposal won't make the Wall more religiously significant. Though this remnant of the outskirts of the ancient Temple tells of a national tragedy some 2,000 years ago, it also reminds us that much of it may have been precipitated by religious zealots.

Hiding behind expressions of piety and reverence, their spiritual descendants today aren't only praying with Orthodox Jews for the improbable rebuilding of the ancient sanctuary, but they also make quixotic and dangerous plans to put it into effect. Should their scheme ever materialize, the devastation of the land and the people of Israel would be infinitely greater now than it was then.

With this in mind, the best way we can serve Judaism in general and Israel in particular is to leave the Wall for secular occasions, for tourists and perhaps for the few pious Jews who pray there daily.

Though gender equality in Israel is of vital importance for its future, and despite a favourable recent ruling by an Israeli court, the champions of equal rights for women should consider more suitable, even if less photogenic, ways of pursuing their just cause.

Bayreuth bound up with the legacy of Richard Wagner

Leonard Bernstein, the great American musician, struggled with ambivalent feelings about Richard Wagner, the renowned German composer and theatre director (1813-1883). In a moment of exasperation, he said, "I hate Wagner, but I hate him on my knees."

Wagner composed soaring epic operas featuring rich orchestration and harmonies and complex textures. His works included Tristan and Isolde, Parsifal, The Flying Dutchman, Tannhauser and Lehergrin, which will be performed at the annual Wagner musical festival in Bayreuth, Germany, from July 25 to Aug. 28.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Wagner, however, was an outspoken antisemite who, in a notorious pamphlet, Judaism in Music, claimed that Jews were an "alien element" in German culture whose influence had to be eradicated. Published in 1850 and reissued in 1869, it was a landmark in the annals of 19th-century antisemitic literature.

Much like Bernstein, Wagner's great-granddaugher, Nike, recoils at the dark dimension of his legacy. "How could such a sleazy character, a trickster and a racist, write such wonderful and enduring music?" she observed in a recent article.

The problem transcends Wagner, who, curiously enough, had an assortment of Jewish friends, from the conductor Hermann Levy to the pianist Karl Tausig. Wagner's heirs, Cosima and Winifred, both perpetuated the antisemitic tone he set after establishing the Bayreuth Festival, or Festspiele, in 1876.

Cosima, the daughter of Franz Liszt and the mother-in-law of the British racist Houston Stewart Chamberlain, claimed that Germany was a "Judaized state." In this spirit, Cosima hired Jews only if a "German" performer was not available, or if their star status made them absolutely indispensable.

In 1924, after an interval of 10 years since the outbreak of World War I, Cosima relaunched the festival as a manifestation of nationalist, antisemitic sentiment, some critics say.

Winifred, a Briton who married Wagner's son, Siegfried, enjoyed a close friendship with Adolf Hitler. Winifred, who succeeded Siegfried as festival director in 1930, joined the Nazi party in the early 1920s, a good decade before Hitler became chancellor. She effectively turned over the festival to the Nazi movement after 1940, when Germany was embroiled in total war.

Hitler, who was born six years after Wagner's death, was addicted to Wagner's music. "My youthful enthusiasm for the Bayreuth master knew no bounds," he mused in Mein Kampf.

In 1933, on the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death, the Nazi party staged a grand celebration in his honour in Leipzig, where, ironically, he was born in its Jewish quarter. From that juncture onward, Hitler regularly attended the festival, giving it tax-exempt status and using it as a propaganda tool to bolster Nazi ideology.

During the war, two-thirds of Bayreuth, a pleasant town in Upper Franconia where Wagner spent 10 years, was destroyed by Allied bombardments. Wagner's theatre, the Festspielhaus, whose design and construction he personally supervised, was miraculously spared.

Under the postwar U.S. occupation, the theatre stopped performing Wagner's operas. But his music was brought back in 1951 with a performance of Parsifal. As for Winifred, she was banned from the festival. Her two sons, Wolfgang and Wieland, succeeded her.

Wolfgang's daughters, Eva and Katharina, took over five years ago in favour of their cousin, Niki.

In honour of this year's bicentenary of Wagner's birth, the German National Tourist Board reports, a host of German cities from Bayreuth and Leipzig to Dresden and Nuremberg will stage celebratory concerts. (Israel, unofficially, still bans Wagner's music).

Bayreuth, population 72,000, is marking the 200th anniversary of his birth with a series of concerts and exhibitions. All over town, signs and banners extol Wagner. A glossy brochure issued by Bayreuth's tourist office reads: "Throughout 2013, Bayreuth will be welcoming to orchestras, choirs and soloists who will be performing both traditional and contemporary interpretations of Richard Wagner's works alongside works by his contemporaries."

Visitors in Bayreuth can also pause at Wagner's unmarked marble grave, and will be able to visit the Richard Wagner Museum once renovations are completed.

Tickets to the festival, which is housed in a sylvan park-like setting, are exceedingly difficult to obtain, with demand (estimated at 500,000) grossly exceeding supply (58,000 tickets).

Bowing to pressure, the festival has tried to come to terms with its antisemitic past. After Winifred's death in 1980, a plaque was installed to pay homage to two Jewish singers who were murdered during the Holocaust, Ottilie Metzger-Lattermann and Henriette Gottlieb.

For the remainder of this year, Silenced Voices, an outdoor installation of grey glass panels etched with the names and photographs of former Jewish performers, will remind visitors that they played no small role at the Bayreuth Festival, the Wagners' antisemitism notwithstanding.

The installation, sponsored by a bevy of prominent German citizens, lies about 50 metres away from the theatre.

Tragically, a number of these distinguished Jewish musicians and singers were murdered in Nazi extermination camps in Poland. Hendrik Prins, a violinist, and Lucian Horwitz, a cellist, were deported to Auschwitz. Henrietta Gottlieb died in the Lodz Ghetto. Hermann Horner, a baritone, was killed in Belzec. Still others, such as Elsa Julich, managed to emigrate before it was too late. Fleeing Germany in 1935, she settled in Palestine, and died in Ramat Gan in 1964.

Richard Wagner

This installation is not the sole reminder of the Nazi era in Bayreuth. The names of Jewish residents in Bayreuth who perished during the Holocaust are inscribed on a wall in the lobby of city hall. On the opposite side, a memorial pays respect to all victims of Nazism and recalls an Allied air raid in April 1945 that killed 875 residents of Bayreuth.

Despite Bayreuth's infatuation with Wagner, some of its inhabitants could not care less about him. "Wagner was only a short time here," said Felix Gothart, the president of Bayreuth's Jewish community, the son of Polish Holocaust survivors and a building renovator. "He is of no interest to me. I don't ignore the festival, but it's not so important for me."

Felix Gothart

A 57-year-old observant Jew whose wife is a Christian convert to Judaism, he is the son of Josef and Rifka Gothart, who participated in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, settled down in Bayreuth after the war and knew a fellow member of the Mizrachi Zionist movement, Kurt Rothschild of Toronto and Israel.

Before the Nazi era, Bayreuth was home to between 200 to 300 Jews, some of whom were deported during the war. But thanks to an influx of Jews from the former Soviet Union, there are now 500 Jews in Bayreuth, which is served by an 18th-century synagogue. A mikvah is due to open in the summer. To Gothart, the present and the future are clearly more important than the past.

TanenbaumCHAT welcomes new head

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Lee Buckman is looking forward to his new position as head of school at what he calls "one of the flagship schools of Jewish day high schools in North America."

In a phone interview from Atlanta, Ga., where he is head of school at Greenfield Hebrew Academy, Rabbi Buckman talked about his upcoming move to Canada, where he will become head of school at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Rabbi Lee Buckman

He succeeds Paul Shaviv, the school's former director of education. Shaviv left last year to become head of school at the Ramaz School in Manhattan.

The change in title does not reflect any change of duties, according to Rhona Birenbaum, TanenbaumCHAT's CFO/executive director and acting head of school. Rather, it was changed so that it would be in line with the title most commonly used by independent schools in Canada and the United States, she said.

Rabbi Buckman – a 51-year-old native of Chicago who says he loves teaching, learning and kids – cited TanenbaumCHAT's "outstanding reputation for educational excellence" as a factor in his decision to take the job. He begins Aug. 1.

The move will bring him and his wife, Rachel, also an educator, closer to family in Detroit. Some of their four sons, now grown, are alumni of Camp Ramah in Canada.

As well, it will bring him back into high school education, a field he left four years ago when he moved to Greenfield, which runs from preschool through Grade 8. Prior to that, he was at the Frankel Jewish Academy of Metro Detroit, a Jewish community high school.

"My feeling is that high school is a particularly critical time for Jewish identity," he said. "The teenage years are very turbulent, and a week of adolescence can wipe out the finest elementary day school education. What I like about high school is that it creates a Jewish context for kids to walk through their adolescent years as they're doubting, challenging, questioning and rejecting."

In 1999, when Rabbi Buckman was hired to start the school in Detroit, he visited CHAT, as well as a few other schools, because of its reputation for "excellent programs."

One of the challenges he expects to face is building relationships with a student body of more than 1,000.

Rabbi Buckman was ordained by the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary and has a master's degree in psychology. He later received Orthodox smichah as well. He served as a congregational rabbi in Milwaukee for nine years before making the move to education.

More recently, he has served as a consultant to Jewish day schools and organizations including Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE).

"I see myself as somebody who can bridge denominational lines, and somebody who stands, on one hand, for a particular expression of Judaism, but at the same time, appreciates that it's the multiplicity of expressions of Judaism that makes Judaism vibrant."

His vision for the school includes "an environment where knowledge is being driven by questions that students ask."

He is cautious, however, about making sure he understands "the context and the culture of Canadian education," before proceeding in ways that may be more applicable to the United States. He plans to visit local public and private high schools to familiarize himself with the differences between the two cultures.

In addition to his administrative duties, he hopes to have opportunities to teach. "Ultimately, I got into this field because I love teaching."

Kosher cuisine reigns supreme as chefs gather

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

"Whose cuisine reigns supreme?" This is a question that begins every Iron Chef episode, but not one usually heard in kosher circles, where you might think that flavour will take a backseat to Halachah.

This is clearly not the case for at least three kosher chefs in Toronto, as the recent Taste for Success Kosher Chef Challenge proved.

Those chefs, David Blum of Hartman's, Ashley Farnell of Culinary Magic and Ayelet Or of Zuchter Berk battled with knives and flame at the Warehouse Event Venue, in the second annual championship of kosher cuisine to benefit the Toronto Teachers' Center of Torah Umesorah, the two-year-old local branch of a nearly 70-year-old organization based in the United States.

Co-hosted by media personality Adrienne Gold and Park Hyatt executive chef Joan Monfaredi, the women-only event offered all the thrill of the televised series in a scaled-down kosher version. Three chefs, 35 minutes and a theme ingredient: blue marlin, a "meaty" fish that was an unusual pick because it's so similar to swordfish that it was long considered non-kosher by many.

Chefs were given only butane burners, convection ovens and a few kitchen tools. Unlike on the real Iron Chef show, there were no sous-chefs or assistants, and unlike last year's event, no preparation was allowed ahead of time. "I don't know why we love to watch people sweat," Monfaredi said jokingly. "But we do."

True to the Iron Chef tradition, the three chefs produced very different dishes with a humble piece of fish: Blum's was presented steak-style, with a galette of potatoes and zucchini, Farnell's was incorporated with a Mediterranean-inspired ratatouille, and Or's was presented herb-crusted and lightly seared, served with beet salad and drizzled with soy and grapefruit juice. Using text messaging, audience members voted for their favourite dish, based on visual appeal.

Tasting the results was a panel that included chefs Samir Elamri of the Windsor Arms Hotel, Sam Kanner of Pantry Foods and Catering, cookbook author Daphna Rabinovitch and thrilled audience member Nancy Weisbrod, a Cordon Bleu-trained chef who'd entered a raffle to win a spot as a judge.

Judging was "very close," Gold announced, but ultimately, based on presentation, creativity and flavour, the winner was Zuchter Berk's Chef Ayelet Or.

"Cooking is natural," Or said in a video recorded before the event. "It's not work, it's a way of life." The secret ingredient that helped her win the competition? "Love."

Participating chefs received a case of kosher wine, courtesy of Herzog Wine Cellars. The winning chef also received a refrigerator from Frigidaire.

Earlier in the evening, a stand-up reception offered more than 330 guests the chance to sample "savoury bites" from local restaurants and caterers including Umami Sushi, Menchen's Catering and Ba-Li Laffa.

Kanner, who won last year's Kosher Chef Challenge, was thrilled to be back judging the event and giving out tasty samples of his restaurant's vegetarian delights: tofu taco, mango salad and a cucumber-melon drink. He said the Toronto Teachers' Center is "a great resource... you have to give teachers as many tools as they can get."

The centre receives 20 per cent of its funding from its international parent organization, Torah Umesorah (its name means "Torah and tradition"), which supports educators in Orthodox day schools. Its activities include workshops on topics like teaching strategies and technology, as well as hands-on support, like poster printing and lamination services, to help teachers create vibrant classrooms.

At $100 for the evening, not many on a teacher's salary could afford to attend, but several, including Bais Chomesh Girls' High School teacher Aydla Wechter, won seats ahead of time. She said the teachers' centre services help her "creatively present holiday themes and activities," and network with other teachers. Its central location, on Bathurst Street just north of Lawrence Avenue, makes the centre "very inviting."

The centre has had more than 5,000 teacher visits since it opened in 2011 and estimates that, thanks to its services, nearly 50,000 students a year benefit from its resources.

"It's a gift to the community," Wechter said. Besides Toronto, there are other Torah Umesorah locations in Chicago, New York, St Louis and Lakewood, N.J.

J-Serve brings out hundreds of teen volunteers

Students lend a hand to make city a better place to live

Taylor Isen
Special to The CJN

More than 500 Jewish students from grades 6 to 12 recently spent an afternoon doing volunteer work in Toronto, including planting trees and picking up litter, as part of the fourth annual J-Serve Toronto.

J–Serve is the Jewish service component of Youth Service America's annual Global Youth Service. J-Serve Toronto is hosted by BBYO in partnership with youth movements, synagogues and social service agencies from across the city. It is funded by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the BBYO Panim Institute.

The students gathered at the gymnasium of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Wallenberg campus, on the morning of April 28, to select a volunteer activity from more than a dozen J-Serve project options.

The HDrummers, an interactive percussion troupe performing Latin, African and Middle Eastern rhythms, entertained, to get the crowd pumped and ready to work.

Volunteer options included litter cleanup at G. Ross Lord Park; a casino-themed day interacting with clients from DANI Toronto, a program for young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges; joining seniors at the Bernard Betel Centre for an afternoon of activities, and tree planting at Downsview and Earl Bales parks. There were also workshops with organizations such as Pencils for Kids, Free the Children and Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Although it was a warm day, with the temperature climbing to above 16 C, the tree-planting volunteers persevered at Earl Bales Park. More than 30 participants planted around 150 trees on a new trail. The process included digging holes, putting the tree in the ground and mulching. The teens, working in groups of two, finished the job in just three hours. The work paid off, when people saw the end results – three new patches of land covered with baby trees native to the land.

Carly Lermer, a Grade 11 student at Westmount Collegiate Institute, said she chose the tree planting and mulching activity because she did the same sort of work while she was in Israel. "Although it's fun, it's a little challenging, too," she said.

Lermer said she takes part in J-Serve as it helps her "know more about my culture" and "helps me learn more as I explore the world."

Grade 9 student Ben Marshall said it was his first year contributing to J-Serve. "J-Serve is helping me learn about my roots, fulfilling tzedakah, just and charitable giving," he said.

J-Serve staff member Edan Kelner, 24, said that as a former member of BBYO, he believes that Jewish teens from different organizations getting together to do something good helps them be more aware of what's out there for them. He added that the best thing about being a supervisor is seeing everyone's smiles, that they're having a good time and, most importantly, that they're realizing they're contributing to making a difference in the world.

The day opened a lot of the participants' eyes as to how they can help make the world a better place.

IBook addresses religious, environmental issues

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

What does Judaism teach us about the environment and what does nature teach us about the Bible?

Jewish educator and environmentalist Baruch Sienna addresses these topics in his first book, The Natural Bible, published by Behrman House, which was launched April 21 at Congregation Darchei Noam. The innovative iBook uses the latest technology for interactive and engaging learning.

"Earth Day certainly seemed an auspicious date for the book launch," Sienna told some 60 people at the launch. "My book stresses Judaism's message that all of us must be stewards of the earth and to live sustainably on this planet. The environmental crisis is the defining issue of our age, and we face enormous challenges. We believe that insights from our Jewish textual tradition can instil a respectful and reverent attitude towards the earth. Appreciating the natural world, in turn, helps us understand our sources and reconnect with Jewish tradition."

The book "explores how religious environmental values can help us have a healthier relationship with the earth, and at the same time, how an appreciation of the natural environment enriches our understanding of the biblical text's use of metaphors from the natural world," Sienna writes in his blog on Jewcology.com.

Baruch Sienna (Susan Minuk photo)

It breaks new ground in the field of Jewish environmental studies for Bible students, nature lovers and anyone concerned about the environment. "Topics include sustainability and stewardship, our relationship with living creatures and God's creation, and environmental justice. Essays on water, plants and animals explore the symbols from the world of nature, and how the Jewish calendar and holiday cycle are linked to the climate and Land of Israel.

"The… book includes a guide to the many plants and trees of the Bible," the blog adds.

Guests at the launch commented on the format of the book. "I have already downloaded the book and had a chance to look at it. I am fascinated by the concept of using the iPad as a medium to deliver messages," guest Paul Robinson said.

It became apparent that readers are beginning to enjoy the advantages of iBooks. For example, in addition to the flexibility of being able to customize the text for your own needs, if a book you purchase is republished with new or additional content, iBooks will let you know. You can then download the updated version for free, and automatically replace the older copy.

In a discussion and demonstration, Sienna shared the innovative technology used in his iBook. "Take it with you, highlight text, take notes and bookmark your favourite passages," he said. "Search for specific text and tap the audio icon to hear Hebrew titles. There is a built-in glossary and index, multimedia and hypertext links.

"My absolutely favourite page in the book is where I discuss how important the moon is in the Jewish calendar. The moon helps us know what day it is, and I thought it would be nice if I could say to the reader, 'Here is what the moon looks like today,' so I have included a picture of the moon. But what is amazing is that every day you look at the picture, it's different! The iBook allows you to show the changes each day, depending on what the moon looks like on that particular day."

Donald Schwartz, chair of the adult education programming committee of City Shul, told The CJN he attended the book launch because of "the subject matter of the [book], which is the way in which Jewish law and ethics can help us to understand and mobilize in support of environmental issues at a time when both micro-environment and the larger environment are at risk."

1st grader shaves head for cancer society

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Jonah Boulakia's smile was a mile wide as his brown locks fell to the ground. Surrounded by family and friends, Jonah, 6, gave up his hair to aid the Canadian Cancer Society in its search for a cure for cancer.

Jonah's dad, Jonathan, clippers in hand, did the momentous shave right down to the skin, at the Boulakia family home in Toronto on April 21.

Jonah told The CJN, "Sometimes when you have cancer your hair falls off, and I am shaving my head to help people who have hair that fell out. There are lots of people I know who have cancer, and I am doing this to help them and everyone in the world who has cancer."

Jonah and his mother, Hannah, asked friends, family, work colleagues, neighbours and his teachers and classmates at John Ross Roberston Jr. Public School to make donations in exchange for Jonah's promising to shave his head.

"I made flyers and distributed them in the neighbourhood, prepared ads in my school bulletin, and have been talking about it with my classmates. My parents created a Facebook and LinkedIn page for people to support my cause," Jonah said. His efforts raised almost $3,000.

"I think I would like to do this again next year and raise even more money," he said.

Sacha Michna, co-ordinator of corporate and community partnerships at the Canadian Cancer Society, Ontario division, said that "with the help of his parents, Jonah has done an outstanding job of fundraising. For someone so young to recognize that cancer is something that affects everyone, and that we can all do our part to fight back, is really quite special. It's great to see that even a little guy like Jonah can have a big impact in the fight against cancer."

Jonah's mom said that her son is a "typical 6-year-old who tends to be quite mischievous, but underneath is an extremely aware and very caring little boy. It was his decision to shave his head and raise funds, having been around too many people who are going through cancer. It is far more than a six-year-old should see. Jonah pushed us to make this happen."

His father added, "He wanted to feel empowered and make a difference – and he is making a big difference."

Jonah's uncle, Mark Griller, said that "Jonah has done a lot of work to raise money for a cause he believes in. I think it gives him good perspective, as he knows some people who have cancer and I think it has broadened his view on things. It is nice to see someone so young taking a positive action."

Another of Jonah's uncles, Charles Boulakia, added, "I think this is fantastic. It is never too young to care – very brave of Jonah to want to take an active and proactive step like this."

Christopher Rzepa, the principal of John Ross Robertson, said that Jonah's "actions show that he has made a strong personal connection with a cause that is near and dear to his heart… It is absolutely wonderful to see one of our young students make such a grand statement, and show such caring and compassion."

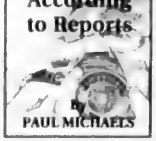
Lack of PA press freedom an unreported story

In her April 30 Toronto Star column ("Palestinian Authority keeps media under thumb"), Vivian Bercovici shines a light on an under-reported phenomenon in the Middle East: the contrast between Israel and the Palestinian Authority when it comes to press freedom.

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

For many journalists who report routinely from Israel and take the country's open, democratic system for granted (the very reason they're based in Israel in large numbers), this contrast is not "news" and thus garners little attention in the West. What sometimes does make news, however, are complaints about occasional constraints by Israeli authorities on their free access to conflict-driven stories involving the IDF in the West Bank and Gaza. Israel's refusal to allow foreign correspondents entry into Gaza during the January 2009 war with Hamas is one example.

The Foreign Press Association (FPA), representing foreign correspondents based in Israel, lists numerous complaints against Israel's security services for "harassment" of, and even "brutality" against, several of its members who try to cover disturbances in the West Bank. However, a former member of the FPA now reporting from the Arab world (who wishes to remain anonymous) said in a recent personal communication: "It's possible that there are a few more incidents of harassment of journalists by Israeli forces, but one cannot overlook particularly arrogant and confrontational elements among certain [Palestinian] correspondents who also view themselves as activists... More importantly, I am sitting in a place now where I find out what real mistreatment of journalists is. They get beat up. They get arrested. They get killed."

In other words, it's important to put things in perspective. That's precisely what Bercovici does in her Star piece.

She lists recent cases in which Palestinians received jail sentences for merely mocking PA President Mahmoud Abbas. She mentions, for instance, the case of a young "PA resident [who] was sentenced to a year in prison for posting a photograph of Abbas kicking a soccer ball with a silly caption: 'Real Madrid's New Striker.'"

That's on the milder end of things in the PA, where intimidation, if not arrest, is par for the course. Not to be ignored are cases where foreign correspondents have been threatened for covering events the PA does not want exposed, such as the lynching of two IDF reservists in Ramallah in 2000 and scenes of Palestinians celebrating immediately after the 9/11 attacks.

It's arguably worse, though, in Gaza under Hamas' rule. As Bercovici notes, Hamas "is reported to have arrested dozens of journalists since coming to power in 2007, torturing and imprisoning some." Bercovici interviewed Bassam Eid, founder and executive director of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, who told her bluntly, "Freedom of the press never existed in Arab culture."

Israel is the only country in the Middle East that's described, according to the U.S. State Department's annual report on human rights, as enjoying "an independent press, an effective judiciary, and a functioning democratic political system [which] combined to ensure freedom of speech and of the press." And yet it's Israel that's often scrutinized for what Bercovici, in a nice turn of phrase, calls "painstaking granularity."

In an April 26 post on the Gatestone Institute's website, Arab-Israeli journalist Khaled Abu Toameh draws attention to what he calls a new phenomenon of Palestinian journalists declaring a state of hostility against their Israeli counterparts.

Speaking of double standards, he writes: "What is disturbing is that foreign journalists based in Israel have not come out against the campaign of [Palestinian] intimidation against their Israeli colleagues. Could it be because these foreign journalists have also been facing threats and want to stay on good terms with Palestinian reporters and will also agree to report only on 'Palestinian suffering?'"

He concludes: "Today, there is a new generation of Palestinian journalists who have evidently been radicalized to a point where any meeting with an Israeli is being viewed as a 'crime.' This is the result of anti-Israel incitement by the Palestinian Authority and Hamas, especially over the past two decades."

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Centre recognizes Canada's support of Israel

JFIC spokesperson Monica Berger said the organization adopted the name "Canada House" in part to recognize the support for Israel by the government of Canada. The facility had been known as the Morasha Community Center.

Dedication of the building took place during the Jerusalem Foundation's annual International Conference Meetings. Part of the festivities included presentation of the annual Teddy Kollek Award to Henry and Julia Koschitzky.

The award, presented in Teddy Kollek Park, recognizes "significant contribution to life in Jerusalem." Teddy Kollek served as mayor of Jerusalem from 1965 to 1993. He was instrumental in creating the Jerusalem Foundation.

The Koschitzkys joined the Hassenfeld family from the United States; Sonja Dinner; the Dear Foundation of Switzerland and Israeli Ruth Cheshin in receiving the award.

Julia Koschitzky, immediate past president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, said, "Jerusalem is the heart and soul of the Jewish People. We pray for it every day. It's a part of our tradition.

"To me, it's an extension of my own community and it's the capital and centre piece of the Jewish People."

Dedicating the community centre as "Canada House" required the permission of the government of Canada, which was granted. "We decided it should, in recognition of the friendship and steadfast support of our government and the Right Honourable Stephen Harper towards Israel… The Jerusalem Foundation stands for the same values of diversity and human rights that Canada stands for," she added.

The Canada House community centre is located in Jerusalem's city centre (Lev Ha'ir), to the northwest of the Old City. The neighbourhood, which lay on the border between Israel and Jordan, was largely destroyed during Israel's 1948 War of Independence, but following the 1967 Six Day War it began to experience revitalization.

Berger said the community centre and Teddy Park, which is located in what used to be an unkempt field near the Jaffa Gate, fit the Jerusalem Foundation's mandate to improve the quality of life of Jerusalem residents through parks, recreational facilities, educational programs and cultural activities. Such facilities are important in retaining young people and young adults in Jerusalem, she added.

"[Canada Centre] bridges gaps between the population of Jerusalem. It's a place where everybody can feel welcome," said Koschitzky.

Canada House is slated to house:

- The Gorman-Shore Learning Centre, providing after-school programs for elementary school children needing remedial help, as well as social and sports activities;
- The Freedman Teen Club and Youth Services, providing education and leadership programming;
- The Springboard Project at the Yaacov Gladstone Leadership Development Centre for Ethiopian Jerusalemites, counselling employment and education options for those completing military service;
- The Weisfeld Computer Centre, offering classes for everyone from kids to seniors;
- The Posluns-Mitz and Holbrook Families "Canada Club," a neighbourhood coffee house.

Among the dignitaries attending the Canada House dedication were Joe Oliver, minister of Natural Resources; Paul Hunt, Canadian ambassador to Israel; Sen. Linda Frum; Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat; Sallai Meridor, international chair of the Jerusalem Foundation, and Lewis Miz, president of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada.

אנה פרנק- תיאטרון הנוער בהצגת בכורה

הבמאית יעל פיינגולד והמפיקה תמי ברמן עושות שוב היסטוריה, ופעם ראשונה בתולדות טורונטו מעלות תיאטרון נוער ישראלי. ההצגה 'אנה פרנק' נבחרה להפקה הראשונה שתוצג ביום ראשון ה 12 במאי בשעה 7 בערב באולם בית הספר ביאליק. לכרטיסים אנא התקשרו לתמי 905.764.7817

"השחקנים עבדו על ההצגה חדשים ארוכים, והרצינות וההקדשה שלהם מעוררת הערכה ותקווה לעתיד התיאטרון הישראלי בטורונטו" אומרת גליה סרנר, ראש הדסק הישראלי במדריכה, שתומכת בתיטרון הנוער, כמו גם באחיו הבוגר, תיאטרון המפגש.

מספר הכרטיסים מצומצם. להתראות באנה פרנק.

ההמנון הישראלי לעומת הקנדי

באירוע השנתי של בית החולים מאיר בכפר סבא ערך הקונסול הישראלי די ג'יי שניוויס השוואה מעניינת בין ההמנון הישראלי והקנדי, שהושרו בפתח האירוע.

"מעניין שבהימנון הקנדי מופיע מספר פעמים המשפט 'אנחנו נגן עליך מולדתנו', אמר שניוייס, דווקא ב'התקווה' לא מוזכרת הגנת המולדת אפילו פעם אחת, למרות שהישראלים נאלצים לעשות זאת כל יום מאז הקמת המדינה".

חשבתי לעצמי כמה שזה אכן מייצג את המציאות: הישראלים אמנם אוהבים את הצבא ומאוד גאים בשיריותם הצבאי, אבל ברובם הם אנטי מיליטריסטים, וכשהם לובשים את המדים במילואים הם נראים ברובם כמו הגשש החיוור. הקנדים לעומתם מעריצים כל דבר צבאי, ומרוב נענועים הם מביימים אחת לשנה את הקרבות שהיו להם נגד האמריקאים לפני מאות שנים.

הדבר הכי קרוב שיש לחייל קנדי להגנת המולדת זה שירות באפגניסטן בו הוא עלול לאבד את חייו מידי הטאליבן, אלפי קילומטרים מארצו. בישראל מושג הגנת המולדת הוא כל כך מוחשי ובלתי מליצי- שאין צורך להזכיר אותו בהמנון, מה גם ש"התקווה" נכתב הרבה לפני שהיתה מדינה להגן עליה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

המזוזה

באירוע השנתי של בית חולים מאיר זכו למדליית הוקרה בני הזוג פרימוצ'י האיטלקים שהקימו את "פיצה נובה" ותורמים מאסיביות לקהילה. מר פרימוצ'י, איש מקסים, הודה למארחים על שאיפשרו לו 'להיות יהודי'. על כך הגיב יושב ראש האירוע אריה רייף בסיפור הבא:

למשפחה יהודיה היה שכן נוצרי,שכל שנה פרצו לביתו מספר פעמים, בזמן שליהודי לא פרצו אף פעם. כששאל את שכנו היהודי מה הסוד שלו, הסביר לו מיסטר כהן שזה בגלל המזוזה. הלך מיסטר כהן ושם מזוזה על דלתו של הגוי, ואכן הפריצות פסקו מיד. על כן מאוד התפלא היהודי שכעבור שנה הגיע הגוי להחזיר לו את המזוזה. "מדוע אתה מוותר על המזוזה למרות שהוכיחה את עצמה כל כך?" שאל כהן את שכנו.

"אני אגיד לך, ענה לו הגוי- מאז ששמתי את המזוזה כל יום מגיעים אלי לפחות שני תורמים שמתיאמים לי את הנשמה. אז עדיף כבר שתים שלוש פריצות בשנה"....

Tikkun Leil Shavuot: the holiday all-nighter

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

On Tuesday, May 14, the first night of Shavuot, tens of thousands of Jews around the world will be burning the midnight oil. And the two o'clock oil. And the four o'clock oil. They will be staying up all night and learning Torah until daybreak as part of Tikkun Leil Shavuot, a tradition with mystical roots and modern adaptations.

Why an all-nighter? Shavuot, of course, is the festival during which we commemorate the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. As the Orthodox Union site explains, "The midrash tells us that some of the people of Israel slept on the night before Matan Torah, and God had to awaken them in order to give them the Torah. Our sages do not fault them for sleeping – they were exhausted from their travels. However, a custom developed to spend the night prior to Matan Torah immersed in Torah study, as a 'better' preparation for the event of the morning." [http://bit.ly/tikkun1] Tikkun is a "correction" or "rectification".

Eliezer Segal writes that the earliest mention of the tradition is found in the 13th-century kabbalistic book, the Zohar. The Zohar tells of the all-night study session held by Rabbi Shimeon bar Yochai over 1,000 years earlier. "Rabbi Shimeon's tikkun was not so much an educational event as a mystical rite. In the Zohar's rich symbolism, Shavuot, the anniversary of the revelation at Mount Sinai, is depicted as a metaphysical wedding of the male and female aspects of the divine. The masculine image of an exalted king is joined with the Shekhinah, the divine presence in our world, portrayed as a princess." [http://bit.ly/tikkun2]

Traditionally on that evening, people would read from a volume called Tikkun Leil Shavuot, which would include a selection from every book in the Torah, the Prophets, the Writings as well as from the Oral Law, the Mishnah. That is followed by a listing of the 613 mitzvot and a brief selection from the Zohar. [http://bit.ly/tikkun3]

The Union for Reform Judaism has created three 64-page study booklets for the evening, which can be downloaded free from its website: Journeying Toward Sinai, Together at Sinai and Aseret Hadibrot: Illuminating the Ten Commandments, which includes the essay "God Revealed at Sinai: Cecil B. Demille and Modern Midrash."

[http://bit.ly/tikkun4]

If you'd like something more traditional, you can download the 486-page Sefer Kriay Moed (Book of the Readings for the Festivals). It was published in 1697 and is now available free online. The section for Shavuot goes from pages 343 to 410. [http://bit.ly/tikkun5]

You've got the background. You've got the books. All you need now is the stamina. In All-Night Learning for Shavuot: You Can Do It!, Esther Kustanowitz provides tips for weary teens who want to stay but are fighting drooping eyelids. One suggestion: relive the moment. Have someone read aloud the account of the giving of the Torah while picturing the "excitement of standing at the base of Mount Sinai, individuals together as a nation ready to receive the word of God... Imagine an ancient version of your contemporary self there, seeing and hearing the things that are recounted in the text." [http://bit.ly/tikkun6]

Have a great night!

A marriage contract for Shavuot

Sephardi Window

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

In many Sephardi congregations, prior to the Torah reading on the first day of Shavuot, a ketubah is read.

This love song was modelled after Shir Hashirim, The Song of Songs, written by King Solomon, the book of the Bible that is a metaphor for the relationship between the Holy One, blessed be He, and the People of Israel. The poem, composed by Rabbi Yisrael Najara (1555-1625), is in the form of a marriage contract between Israel and the Torah.

Even though some of the meaning of this great poetic song is lost when it is translated, I'd like to share some excerpts from it.

• My Beloved went down to His garden, to His bed of spices,/ To delight in the princess, and to spread over her the canopy of His peace;/ "King Solomon made for himself a palace."

• My beloved, My doe, come with Me to My chamber, My hall,/ For your sake I have left all the legions above, and their host;/ "And I have betrothed you unto Me forever."

• Said the Awesome One,/ You Who from the time of love I have heard Him,/ And I love Him with an eternal love,/ "May He kiss me with the kisses of His mouth!"

• To go to the wedding canopy, agreed the dancer of the camps,/ And for her "We will do, and then obey"/ merited 600,000 crowns;/ "In the third month, from the time/ That Israel left Egypt."

• And the connection was strong/ With this nation, which He acquired at Sinai,/ And the Deed of Purchase and the Signature/ I read for My throngs,/"Behold! It is written before Me."

• On the Sixth Day I will read what is written in the Letter,/ A day on which to bequeath to His beloved ones the Torah,/ The living God did intend,/ "Six Days in the month of Sivan."

• ...That He should not travel far away,/ Or make His way in the sea,/ Without the Torah placed near His heart;/ "It should be with Him, and He shall read from it."

• Let the righteous see and rejoice,/ And let them enjoy their reward,/ Of a Testimony that is "longer than the land,/ And wider than the sea,"/ "And all is strong, and clear, and steadfast!

• And He established the Torah in Jacob with vigour,/ And He commanded to erect its fences/ So no one would break through!/ "And I established faithful witnesses,/ The Heavens and the Earth!

• Let the bridegroom rejoice with the bride,/ To take for his possession,/ And let the heart of the bride rejoice/ With the husband of her youth,/ And let her say to the one who sings His praises,/ "Happy is the People for whom it is so!"

This ketubah expresses the responsibility we have taken by accepting the Torah. Talmud Zevachim (116A) teaches that the Torah was hidden in God's treasure for 974 generations before He gave it to us. How fortunate are we to have gotten it!

Let us all realize the invaluable gift that God has given us. Without it, there would not be a Jewish Nation! This Book has kept us alive, and today we can proudly say: "Am Yisrael Chai Vekayam!"

Welcoming women into religious leadership

Four years ago, I attended a shivah minyan facilitated by Rabba Sara Hurwitz, the first woman ordained as a full member of the Orthodox clergy. As the elderly widow choked back tears and struggled through Kaddish, Rabba Sara held her tight.

That scene was enough to convince me of the critical need for female spiritual and halachic leadership. But the need is far broader than shivah.

The time has come for strong leadership on both sides of the mechitzah: for female rabbinic leaders to celebrate births with new mothers, to help women bensching Gomel after an illness, and to escort mourners into the sanctuary on the Friday night of shivah.

Even more than an empathetic shoulder during life-cycle events, we need strong, year-round female role models. Young girls should be exposed to female rabbinic leaders the same way male rabbis are role models for boys. They should see women who pray with intent, lead with conviction, and are respected for their scholarship, skill and compassion.

For too long women's voices have been excluded from religious leadership – and in Canada this is true in both Conservative and Orthodox communities. In too many cases, this is as true in communal leadership, as it is in halachic leadership. While the low-hanging fruit may be welcoming women to deliver sermons or sit on boards, it is incumbent on contemporary Jewry to welcome women's voices into the rabbinic and halachic conversation. Half of our community has, historically, been disenfranchised from the debates that shape halachic norms and religious practice, including laws of marriage and divorce, kashrut, Shabbat and holidays.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Enter Yeshivat Maharat. While the last quarter century has seen the growth of women's learning programs – teaching women Torah, Talmud and other content areas – until the establishment of Yeshivat Maharat four years ago, there was no institution in North American training Orthodox women to be spiritual and halachic leaders. Yeshivat Maharat's curriculum parallels that of other top-tier rabbinical schools – rabbinic and halachic study combined with training in education, pastoral care, homiletics and communal leadership.

Yeshivat Maharat's first graduates will be ordained in June. Already these women are in high demand. As Rabba Hurwitz recently noted, "People are thirsting for a new type of leadership, and what the future is evolving into is bringing women as spiritual leaders and halachic decisors." I have been excited to hear the list of synagogues and Hillels, schools and other communal institutions seeking the leadership of these highly trained and motivated women.

The ordination of these women is not without controversy. What religious roles may these women play and what is outside the bounds of their role? What title should they adopt – rabbi, rabba, maharat (an acronym for halachic, rabbinic and Torah leadership)? These debates, while important conversations on the local community level, are technical rather than adaptive challenges. Within the broad strokes of history, the particulars of job description and title will be footnotes to the story of expanded women's leadership.

It is in this context that I applaud Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation, which snapped up Rachel Kohl Finegold, one of Yeshivat Maharat's first three graduates. Rabbi Kohl Finegold and Shaar Hashomayim are blazing the trail of the future.

Camps open to people with special needs

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Two Ontario summer camps have partnered with Yachad, the Orthodox Union's (OU) agency for people with special needs.

At the Toronto day camp, Moshava Ba'ir (MBT), and at the sleep-away camp, Moshava Ennismore, near Peterborough, Ont., disabled children and adults will be given the opportunity to participate in social and educational programs.

The camps are divisions of the modern Orthodox Bnei Akiva religious Zionist youth movement and OU's National Jewish Council for Disabled.

At Camp Moshava Ennismore, campers with special needs, aged eight to 15, will have separate male and female bunks. There will be a high ratio of counsellor staff to participants, and campers with special needs will take part in activities with the mainstream campers.

Camp Moshava Ba'ir, a day camp for children, will introduce a vocational skills program that is intended to help local residents, aged 18 to 30, with special needs.

These participants will be integrated with the daycare staff at the camp. They will be given assignments based on their interests and skill levels, among them assisting with arts and crafts or sports programs, and will work under the guidance of a job coach.

Yachad will provide social programming for all staff.

"This involvement will enable adults with disabilities to be a staff member, just like any other staff, where they can learn important vocational and social skills," said Nachama Braun, Yachad summer program administrator.

The day camp, Moshava Ba'ir, and the sleep-away camp, Moshava Ennismore, are open to campers with special needs.

Vicky Shizgal, director of Camp Moshava, said, "The experience that Yachad has will ensure that the programs will be implemented successfully, which will further our goals of giving every Jewish child an opportunity to experience what Jewish summer camp has to offer."

Dr. Joe Goldfarb, director of summer programs for Yachad, which co-ordinates 16 camps in the United States, one in Israel and the pilot camps in Canada, said, "We are excited to expand Yachad's mission of inclusion within the broad Jewish community by participating in Moshava Ennismore and Moshava Ba'ir Toronto."

For more information on Camp Moshava Ennismore or Camp Moshava Ba'ir, contact yachadsummer@ou.org or call 212-613-8369.

Poland honours CIJA for helping secure aid to preserve Auschwitz

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Polish government has awarded its highest honour to two members of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) who helped convince Ottawa to donate $400,000 to the Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation last year.

In May 2012, Prime Minister Stephen Harper pledged the money toward the restoration effort while hosting Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk during his state visit to Ottawa. Those funds recently flowed through to Poland.

On Monday, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel and the centre's senior government adviser, Richard Marceau, were awarded Poland's Gold and Silver Crosses of Merit, respectively, in recognition of their "services to the development of the Polish-Canadian co-operation, and the remembrance of the victims of the Holocaust" by the Polish Embassy in Canada.

Through their government-relations work with CIJA, both Fogel and Marceau helped Polish officials reach out to Canadian cabinet ministers, opposition members and other decision makers in Ottawa after the Poles asked for their help securing funding for the foundation.

At the time of Canada's pledge to the foundation last year, the Prime Minister's Office released a statement declaring that the government "is committed to supporting Holocaust education, research and remembrance with a view to ensuring this heinous act is never forgotten or repeated."

Established in 2009, the Auschwitz-Birkenau Foundation is a Polish non-governmental organization seeking to preserve the former Nazi concentration and extermination camp by raising 120 million euros ($154 million Cdn) to cover the site's conservation costs.

According to Polish Embassy spokesperson Andrzej Fafara, the foundation has now raised close to 97 million euros ($128 million) in donations as of May.

He also said it's "uncommon" for any non-Polish citizen to receive the award, but that his government was grateful for all the help provided by Fogel and Marceau in their roles as liaisons with Canadian senior officials.

While Canada's contribution falls short of major donations from other countries – Germany has given 60 million euros ($70 million), the United States pledged 15 million euros ($20 million) and Poland 10 million euros ($13 million), to name a few – the gesture is appreciated by Poland nonetheless, Fafara said.

Fogel said it's important for CIJA to help Canadian parliamentarians understand the need to preserve the Auschwitz-Birkenau memorial site.

"Just as there has to be collective responsibility for the tragedy of the Holocaust, there's a collective responsibility for remembering it, sanctifying it and resolving to use those lessons going forward," Fogel said.

Asked what getting this award meant to him, Fogel said that as a child of survivors, the awarding of this medal is laden with meaningfulness and historic significance.

"Seventy years ago, Poles were looking for ways to help the Nazis advance their agenda to destroy the Jews. But who would have thought that today, Poles and a Canadian Jewish communal organization would be working together to create a lasting monument to those who were murdered? I find it very special," he said. "[Marceau] and I are privileged to have been able to assist."

Mideast Jewish refugees to be studied by Ottawa

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs is scheduled to wrap up two days of study this week on the experience of Jewish refugees from Middle Eastern countries.

The committee was to have heard from eight witnesses by the time it concluded its session on May 9, including representatives of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC).

Sylvain Abitbol

In a news release, CIJA stated it has long called for a change to Canadian foreign policy "so that it correctly reflects the historic plight of Jewish refugees from Arab countries."

More than 850,000 Jews fled persecution throughout the region after Israel's creation in 1948, but "Canada's official Middle East policy neglects this fact, only accounting for Palestinian refugees," CIJA stated.

South of the border, the U.S. House of Representatives has already taken action on the file. In 2008, the House adopted a resolution that stated in part that a "comprehensive Middle East peace agreement... must address and resolve all outstanding issues relating to the legitimate rights of all refugees, including Jews, Christians and other populations."

In 2012, bipartisan Congressional lawmakers sponsored a bill to recognize the plight of Jewish refugees from Arab countries, as well as other refugees, such as Christians from the Middle East, North Africa, and the Persian Gulf. The resolution also called on the Obama administration to bring up the issue of Jewish and other refugees when mentioning Palestinian refugees at international forums.

At the time, JJAC vice-president Sylvain Abitbol stated, "Right now Jewish refugees are not on the international agenda. We have been called the forgotten refugees. After 1948, many Arabs from Palestine left their homes and yes they have been refugees. The difference is that we were never called refugees. We adapted to the places where we went, which was not the case for Arab refugees."

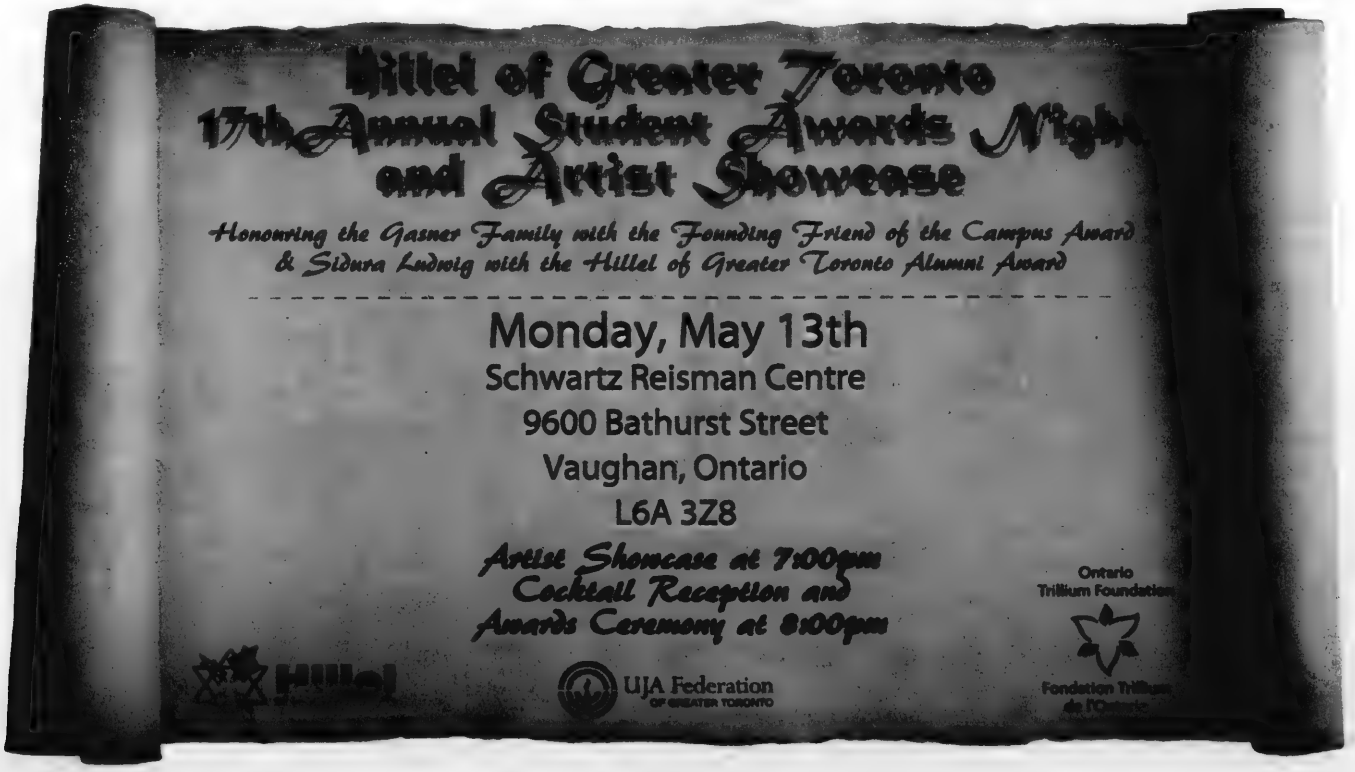
Abitbol, who served as co-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said, "We're talking about recognition, about justice."

CIJA chair David Koschitzky applauded the foreign affairs committee for examining the situation faced by Jews who had resided in Arab lands.

"Two refugee populations were created as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict – one Palestinian and the other Jewish. Unfortunately, the plight of Jewish refugees has been completely omitted from Canada's Middle East policy while that of the Palestinians features prominently. It is essential that policymakers correct this inherent imbalance in Canadian policy. Equitable consideration of Jewish refugees from Arab countries is a necessary component for any just and lasting Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement."

Committee chair Dean Allison did not respond to requests for an interview.

Iraq is just one of the many Arab countries that Jews have left over the years.



May 31 deadline set on newspaper's future

With the help of management, Goldberg immediately embarked on a four-pronged strategy to establish a more secure economic underpinning for a renewed print edition of The CJN.

The strategy entails refurbishing and updating the paper's approach to subscriptions and subscription revenues, enhancing advertising revenues through new, long-term arrangements with current and prospective advertisers, establishing a safety net of funding to cushion the paper through periods of advertising revenue shortfalls, and streamlining the newspaper's current operations.

Goldberg told The CJN that he views this assignment as "absolutely vital to the well-being of the community. So many members of the community, of all ages, all backgrounds, affiliations, non-affiliations and from all corners of the country have spoken to us. And we are doing our best to respond."

Goldberg's sentiments were echoed by veteran CJN board member Lionel Schipper, who said that the "community has expressed its strong sentiment that CJN's print edition should be saved. But that will only happen if members of the community come forward with support. I am delighted to say that the board's efforts to secure the necessary financial support have, so far, been very encouraging. I believe Marty will have the tools he needs to pull this off."

As he writes in this edition of the paper, Carr is also "optimistic that we will be able to obtain what we need to achieve our goal of maintaining a Canadian Jewish News print newspaper, including a viable publication for Montreal, as well as strengthening the Internet edition."

Alana Kayfetz and Rachel Singer, the young professionals who co-founded the savethecjn.com initiative that crystallized the community outcry at the prospect of the paper's closing, said their involvement in the paper's rebirth will not end with last week's rescue decision by the board.

In an email to The CJN, they wrote that "readers have spoken and told us that the Canadian Jewish News is a vital source of communication that touches all facets of the community. This is why we're launching Project CJN 2.0. With a grassroots approach, Project CJN 2.0 will strive to help implement a sustainable plan that will continue to serve the community for many more years to come."

Many observers noted the irony that it was the key participation of young adults, long presumed to have a waning interest in the paper, who, through social media, galvanized the community to try to prevent the closure of the print edition.

Goldberg has given himself a deadline of May 31 to announce whether there will be a new version of the printed CJN.

Jewish mysticism included in meditation retreat

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

A "mindfulness meditation retreat" that incorporates teachings from Jewish mystical tradition is set for May 23 to 26 at the Galilee Centre in Arnprior, Ont.

Sponsored by the True North Insight Meditation Center, the retreat will be led by Rabbi Jeff Roth, director of Awakened Heart Project, an organization that aims to refine contemplative Jewish practices, such as meditation and prayer.

The retreat is "an opportunity to deepen your own mindfulness practice regardless of any prior connection to Jewish practice," according to a True North press release.

"It is a model for how mindfulness can be integrated into other spiritual traditions and is open to people of all backgrounds and prior experience with mindfulness meditation."

Over the past 20 years, meditation has entered Jewish life in a way that's accessible to Jews of all denominations, as well as those not affiliated with one, True North says.

"Originally this was in reaction to meditation practices that came to the west from the east. But with an openness to spiritual wisdom from all sources that characterizes some contemporary Jewish circles, a new synthesis has been created that honours the practice teachings of mindfulness meditation."

Rabbi Roth, who hails from Esopus, N.Y., said in a telephone interview that the goal of the retreat is to teach participants to think in the moment and be aware of the thinking process that unfolds in the mind.

"This form of meditation takes away roadblocks – thoughts that prevent people from seeing reality," he said.

"This approach, when added to Jewish practice, creates an opening into Jewish mysticism and [toward the] direct experience of a divine presence."

He said that mindfulness meditation gives people the tools to see what's going on in their minds and not get trapped in worrisome thoughts.

"At the retreat, we will create an atmosphere in which one can [learn] and practise these methods."

The retreat begins at 3:30 p.m. on May 23 and concludes after lunch on May 26.

Participants will take part in daily periods of prayer, chant and meditative movement. Daily instruction in meditation will help guide both beginning and advanced practitioners. The weekend will also include Shabbat observance.

Fundraiser slated to fight neurological disorder

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

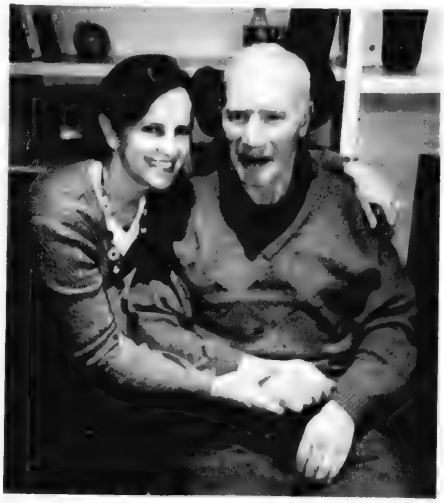
A benefit concert will be held at Holy Blossom Temple for the Friends of Stephen Rivers Care Project, and to support research into multiple system atrophy (MSA), a degenerative neurological disorder.

Stephen Rivers, 64, a Toronto psychologist originally from Ottawa, was diagnosed with MSA three years ago.

As his illness progressed, friends of Stephen and his wife, Lindi, 53, a cantorial soloist at Holy Blossom, began providing cooked meals for the family – Stephen has a 23-year-old son, and together the couple has two daughters, 19 and 16. Friends also began staying with Stephen when he could no longer be left alone.

Lewis Molot, a professor in the faculty of environmental studies at York University, said the group of friends started the project last summer "when we realized how exhausted Lindi had become providing many hours of personal care.

"We wanted to help Steve, but we also wanted to ensure that Lindi remained strong enough to manage Steve through his illness, and still have something left for herself and her daughters."



Lindi and Stephen Rivers

He said that Lindi and Stephen's friends from around the world have rallied, and have raised money for in-home personal care and physiotherapy equipment.

Lindi said that although Stephen was officially diagnosed three years ago, there were "soft signs" for two to three years previously.

They were shocked with the diagnosis, she said, "and we went through a period of grieving. Now, we are coming to terms with reality. Stephen said, at first, the diagnosis was worse than cancer, because at least with cancer there is a treatment plan. He only has symptom management.

"It started with a lack of balance and with some voice issues. We noticed he had trouble singing at the Shabbat table," Lindi said.

"Since then, it has been a process of adaptation. He started with a cane, but he had lots of falls. Then he tried a walker, and now he is in a wheelchair because his legs are getting weaker and weaker."

Stephen said that another symptom of his disease is "emotional incontinence. My emotions are right out there on my sleeve. I've always had a sense of humour, but now things seem extra funny, or on the other hand, extra sad. I've tried to keep my sense of humour but it is getting harder and harder."

They are both very frightened, he said. "We don't know from week to week what the next challenge will be."

Lindi said that what has helped the family to keep going is the outpouring of support from the community. "Friends, the Holy Blossom community and our family have been unbelievable with meals and funds to help with Stephen's care.

"As Steve's illness progresses we have to keep adding help. We are eligible for only 14 hours a week of help from the Community Care Access Centre."

She said when they were approached about the concert, they were initially hesitant, "because it put us in the spotlight. I realized though, that so many people want to help but don't know how. This is a good vehicle."

Their one condition, Lindi said, is that part of the money raised at the concert be earmarked for research into MSA, through the movements disorder clinic at Toronto Western Hospital.

For information about the Friends of Stephen and Lindi Rivers in Concert, on June 2 at Holy Blossom Temple, 7:30 p.m, call 416-789-3291.

Ryerson students help survivors tell stories

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Mary Gale's family had no idea she was Jewish. After the Holocaust, she was scared to tell people her religion, or even her birth name, Miriam Zimmerman. She didn't even tell her son when he converted to Judaism and made aliyah.

But now, thanks to the Sustaining Memories Project, she has put her story in writing.

The project is an extension of the Azrieli Foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs program, which collects and shares survivors' stories. The problem was that not all survivors were able to write their own stories.

Through a partnership with Ryerson University's Chang School of Continuing Education, survivors meet with mature students – 50 years or older – who listen to the stories, transcribe the conversations and turn them into memoirs.

Ruth Krongold was Gale's writing partner. She listened to Gale's stories, and then worked with her to "put the pieces in the puzzle together."

The stories described how Gale spent decades after the war hiding her Jewish identity. It wasn't until she had a heart attack that she told her youngest child, Anita Stern, that she was Jewish.

When she turned 80, she visited Poland with her daughter, and saw the spot where her father was murdered in 1944. She described it as an incredibly emotional experience, and it was the catalyst for the sharing of her story with her family.

Krongold said she wanted to help with the project after attending an Azrieli Foundation presentation during Holocaust Education Week a couple years ago. There, she learned about the foundation's collections of stories and decided she wanted to get involved in collecting the memories.

> 'As long as there are Holocaust survivors like Mary who want to tell their stories, we should be listening, we should be recording it, we should be compassionate witnesses to their experiences'

"As long as there are Holocaust survivors like Mary who want to tell their stories, we should be listening, we should be recording it, we should be compassionate witnesses to their experiences," she said. "I thought it was important as a human being to hear it."

Last year was the pilot year, and Elin Beaumont, outreach and communications manager for the program, said she was pleasantly surprised when 18 people signed up to take part in it.

This year, 19 more survivors shared their stories. They gathered at Baycrest Terraces on May 2 with their families and were presented with printed and bound copies of their memoirs. That was the first time the family members got to see the story.

In the future, Beaumont said she would like to expand the project outside of the Toronto area to include survivors from communities all throughout Canada.

The memoirs created through the Sustaining Memories Project will be considered for distribution to libraries, educational institutions and Holocaust-education programs, as is the case with the stories completed from the Holocaust Survivor Memoirs program.

Stern said the program has been a huge help for her mother. Although Gale was still a bit nervous about telling the world she was Jewish, Stern said the two of them had been discussing the May 2 event for weeks.

"I said to her… 'This is it. There's no going back,'" Stern said. "I think this is a turning point for her."

Why we need to save The CJN

The great poet and writer Samuel Johnson once opined that "the two offices of memory are collection and distribution." Indeed, then newspapers are for many the official vehicle that both collect memory and distribute it so that we are all better informed.

Much has been said and written about the possible demise of a veritable institution in this country, The Canadian Jewish News. There was hardly a gathering of Jews anywhere I travelled this week and last week, both inside and outside Toronto, where the discussion did not turn to this distressing news.

And the questions, though obvious, nonetheless beg for answers. What happened? How did the board of The CJN allow this to happen? What can we do?

Before answering the last question, let's examine the first two.

In the Canadian Jewish community, we seem all too often to take for granted that which has been around for a long time. The organization that I formerly headed, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), was formed in 1919. It spoke on all matters of social justice, human rights and antisemitism. In many ways, it seemed to be more respected outside the Jewish community than within it. Nevertheless, it was also understood to be our conscience and soul. It was very much the voice of Canadian Jewry. But two years ago, in a dramatic re-shaping of Canadian Jewry's organizational life, it was suddenly gone, as T.S. Eliot might say, "not with a bang but a whimper."

Bernie Farber

Even today, at functions and cocktail parties or other gatherings, I am asked about the goings-on at the CJC. When I explain that it no longer exists, I get blank stares and questions of incredulity: "What happened? How can this be?"

Yet here we are today, facing the potential shattering loss to Canadian Jewry of The CJN. However, this time, there seems to be a different feeling in the air. There is a clear recognition that with the potential loss of The CJN, we lose a large piece of who we are as a community of Jews. There will be no communication vehicle left in the country that, for all intents and purposes, is independent, practises professional journalism and unites the Jewish community from coast to coast.

This will have an impact not just on the average community member, but on Jewish communal organizations as well. Be it ORT, Hadassah, JNF or the myriad of acronymic Jewish groups that counted on The CJN to get their information out or dispense their own views of the world, that car, if plans to dismantle the paper continue, will be without fuel.

My friend and colleague, Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, which absorbed and replaced the CJC, certainly understood the issue well when he explained recently in an interview, "Absent The CJN, it's going to create serious challenges for us to ensure an adequate level of awareness of what we do, how we do it and ways [people] can become more directly engaged in the advocacy process."

Sadly, there is more to this potential loss than meets the eye. Jews have always been people of the book and voracious readers with many opinions. The development of a Jewish press in North America and Canada specifically spoke to a community that grew along with its ability to speak out freely without fear.

As far back as the early 1900s, there was an open and healthy Jewish press in Toronto and Montreal, where the vast majority of Jews lived. Der Yidisher Zshurnal (The Jewish Journal) was Toronto's first Jewish community daily, published six days a week in Yiddish, the language of eastern European Jews. Similarly, the Adler (the Eagle) fulfilled the same role in Montreal. And over the years, many other Jewish journals and magazines in both English and Yiddish continued to offer new immigrants – and later their children – news about our community. Whether it was the Jewish Standard, the communist-inspired Proletarisher Gedank (which later changed its name to Der Veg – The Way), the Canadian Jewish Review or the Kanader Naies (Canadian News), the competition, editorial stands and provision of community information rarely ceased.

Today, for perhaps the first time in our young history as a Jewish community in Canada, we may be without a trusted journalistic Jewish voice.

To be sure, voices are being raised. To my utter delight and surprise, the strongest of these voices seem to be emanating from a new, younger generation of readers. Twenty-something folks like Rachel Singer and Alana Kayfetz (ironically the niece of the late Ben Kayfetz, one of Canada's most prolific Jewish journalists and community professionals from days gone by) are putting words into action. Utilizing a 21st-century communications device, the Internet, they have developed a "Save the CJN" campaign which to date has gathered more than 3,000 digital signatures and close to 50,000 page views.

Playwright Arthur Miller once intoned: "A good newspaper is a nation talking to itself." Indeed, The CJN talked to a nation of Canadian Jews for more than 40 years. To let it die without a bang would be a disservice to who we are as a people. Perhaps if we stood up this time and as my late father use to say "open a mouth," we can save us from ourselves.

Law's encounter with the Holocaust

Lorne Sossin

Osgoode Hall Law School at York University and its library recently hosted the only Canadian showing of The Face of the Ghetto: Pictures by Jewish Photographers from the Lodz Ghetto, 1940-1944, an exhibition of photographs taken during the German occupation of Lodz, Poland, during World War II.

The remarkable exhibit did not depict the violence and suffering of ghetto life, but rather the defiance of a community determined to continue individual and community life. For example, one photo highlighted life in a school; another focused on care for the elderly; one photo documented Jewish policemen and firemen in the ghetto, while yet another featured a wedding. The ghetto was indeed a place of disease and tears but also of resilience and resistance.

But what do these images have to do with the law and legal education?

At the launch of the exhibit, Prof. Jan. T. Gross, of Princeton University, author of several books, including Neighbors, spoke of the devastating experience of Jewish communities being victimized and plundered by their neighbours in Poland (and across Europe) with whom they had lived among for centuries. In many cases, trials followed only years later based on eyewitness testimony from those who could no longer remain silent.

The legal process became in some places the only forum in which the truth could be told. These trials of individuals grew into trials of communities – as Gross wrote in his study, Golden Harvest: "One Jew killed by one perpetrator – but in a public manner, with the approval and encouragement of a crowd of onlookers – represents a collective deed, implicating all those present."

Last month, Devin Pendas, a professor at Boston College and Fellow of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, spoke to a packed house at the law school about the possibilities and limits of law to address the irreparable loss and suffering of the Holocaust. In trials throughout Europe in the 1940s and 1950s, courts grappled with how to treat concentration camp guards who made life and death decisions on a whim: Nazi bureaucrats who never saw Jewish communities but were responsible for countless thousands of deaths and collaborators in occupied territories who were sometimes themselves victims of Nazi atrocities.

Pendas noted how courts tended to focus on individual acts of torture and murder but had no basis in their legal culture to come to terms with genocide. For example, one camp guard received more than 100 life sentences as a perpetrator for individual murders that had been documented by witnesses and a further two-year sentence for being an "accomplice" in the deaths of tens of thousands others. Later on the same day, a panel discussion at the law school poignantly explored attempts to bring to justice those responsible for the massacres in Rwanda in the 1990s.

The story of law's encounter with the Holocaust is not simply history, but rather an ongoing struggle to bring dignity to victims, and accountability to those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity. It is as relevant in 2013 as it was in 1945.

This Lodz Ghetto exhibit served as a catalyst for talks, workshops, films and discussions throughout the hallways and student lounges of the law school. One student mentioned to me a conversation he had with an elderly man with no connection to the university who had made his way to Osgoode to see the photos. The student and some of his friends directed the man to the library. A short while later, he returned, sat with the students and told stories of his father who had lived in the ghetto. The student described the encounter to me as a moving and unexpected element of his legal education.

Many members of the Osgoode community have personal connections to the Lodz Ghetto, as do I. My youngest daughter, Leah, is named for my great-grandmother who died with her husband, siblings and all but two of her children (who had emigrated to Toronto, the youngest of whom was my Grandmother Fay).

As I looked at the pictures in the exhibit, it is possible I saw people who knew and lived alongside my family, and perhaps even unidentified cousins. Growing up, I learned of the ghetto only as a place of deprivation and death. Seeing the photographs brought that community, and the spirit and courage of its residents, to life.

The exhibit also offered us an opportunity to reflect on the values and goals of legal education. Through art and culture, law is humanized. We focus not on abstract principles and constructs but on the stories of those touched by injustice.

As many in the Jewish community know, universities may sometimes be the venue for speakers and events that provoke, and even offend. Academic freedom, however, must be seen through the lens of our core values of respect and inclusion, just as those values must be seen through the lens of academic freedom. While there may be issues that from time to time test the strength of the university's relationship with our own community and our broader communities, the university must serve as a catalyst for dialogue and reflection.

The Face of the Ghetto exhibit represented an important landmark in that regard. It was amazing to see how extraordinary depictions of ordinary life 75 years ago and half a world away could have such a sustained impact on our community today.

Lorne Sossin is the dean of Osgoode Hall Law School at York University.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Cookbook will leave you asking for 'More Please'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The idea for More Please, the cookbook produced by Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto's Parent Teacher Council, was born in the kitchen of one of its members about 2-1/2 years ago.

The almost 400-page, 900-recipe hardcover cookbook has become the largest project ever undertaken by the council.

Jody Pasoff, who chaired the cookbook committee along with Ann Rastin and Dina Farber, said that after they embarked on the project, it quickly became a labour of love.

"We turned each of our houses into a studio, and we tested, tasted and rated the more than 1,000 recipes that were submitted by parents, grandparents, teachers and administrators, friends and nannies."

Rastin said they rated the recipes using four levels – wouldn't feed a dog, edible, family worthy and fit for the queen. "Only recipes that we would feed to the queen made it into print."

Despite using recipes fit for a queen, however, they also wanted to include recipes that are easy to cook, with ingredients that are easily accessible.

"We want people to open the book, choose a recipe, and find most of the ingredients in their cupboard. Associated is a diverse community, and we have included recipes from around the world."

Their families were their guinea pigs, Pasoff said. "One day we made 26 chicken recipes, and on another, 65 people turned out to test 73 cookie recipes. We spent many days cooking along with 14 other people."

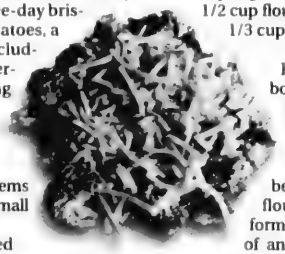
They consulted with Simcha Wines in order to pair the main courses with an appropriate kosher wine, she said. "They paired the wines and the recipes thoughtfully, and kept the wines reasonably priced."

The entire book, from testing to editing to layout to photography to publishing, was done by committee members, Rastin said.

The "buzz" around More Please has been unbelievable, Pasoff said. "We have already raised $70,000 for the school. All the money will be spent on things desperately needed by the school, such as a scoreboard for the gym at the Kamin campus."

The book is available in Judaica stores and at Indigo Books.

Along with favourites such as dairy free butter chicken, three-day brisket and Friday night potatoes, a number of recipes, including the following, are perfect for the upcoming Shavuot holiday.



BROCCOLI SALAD

2-3 bunches broccoli, stems peeled, chopped into small pieces
1 cup red onions, chopped
1 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. white vinegar
1-2 tbsp. sugar, to taste
1 cup dried cranberries or raisins
1 cup pine nuts or sunflower seeds salt and pepper to taste
1 cup grated cheddar cheese, old or medium, optional

In a large bowl, combine broccoli, mayonnaise, vinegar, sugar, cranberries, pine nuts, salt and pepper. Mix well.

Transfer to a serving bowl. Cover and refrigerate until needed. Sprinkle with cheese at serving time if desired. Yields 12-16 servings.

DELICIOUS EASY SALMON TERIYAKI

8 salmon filets
sesame seeds, to garnish
Marinade:
6 tbsp. dry sherry
6 tbsp. brown sugar
4 tbsp. water
2 tbsp. soya sauce
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 1/2 tsp. ginger, minced
2 tsp. garlic, crushed

In a large bowl combine sherry, brown sugar, water, soya sauce, oil, ginger and garlic. Mix well. Place salmon fillets in marinade. Let stand 20 minutes.

Preheat oven to 400. Line a baking dish with parchment paper. Remove salmon from marinade and place on prepared baking dish. Keep marinade.

In a saucepan, boil remaining marinade until it becomes thick and syrupy. Brush it on the fish. Sprinkle with sesame seeds to coat well. Cook for 10-15 minutes uncovered, or until the fish flakes easily with a fork.

Yields 8 servings. Serve with Dalton Safsufa Sauvignon-Viognier.

CARAMELIZED PEAR CHEESECAKE

1 cup flour
1/2 cup unsalted butter
2 egg yolks
3 8-oz. pkgs. cream cheese
3/4 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
2 tbsp. unsalted butter
3/4 cup sugar
6 pears, peeled, seeded and sliced
Topping:
1/4 cup sugar
1/2 cup flour
1/3 cup unsalted butter

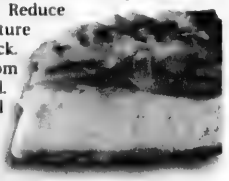
Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl with a pastry cutter or 2 knives cut 1/2 cup butter into 1 cup of flour forming tiny pieces.

In a separate bowl beat 2 egg yolks. Mix with flour pieces until dough forms a ball. Press into bottom of an ungreased 9-in. springform pan. Bake for 20 minutes. Remove from oven and allow to cool slightly.

In a mixer, combine cream cheese with 3/4 cup sugar. Beat well. Gradually add 3 eggs and vanilla. Beat well. Set aside.

Once crust has cooled slightly, pour in cheese mixture and return to oven for 40-50 minutes or until set.

In a large skillet over low heat, melt 2 tbsp. butter. Carefully add 3/4 cup sugar allowing it to brown. Do not burn sugar. Add pears. Cook uncovered for approximately 15 minutes or until pears are tender. Reduce until mixture is quite thick. Remove from heat and cool.



In a bowl combine 1/4 cup sugar and 1/2 cup flour. Using a pastry cutter or 2 knives, cut in 1/3 cup butter until mixture is crumbly.

Once cake is done, remove from oven and allow to cool for 10 minutes. Spread with pear mixture and sprinkle with topping.

Preheat oven to broil. Place under broiler until browned. Refrigerate overnight before serving.

China rebukes Israel for Syria strike

The Times of Israel

SHANGHAI, China — As Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu arrived in Shanghai Monday hailing Israel-China trade relations, Beijing appeared to be rebuking Israel for attacking its neighbour to the north.

"We oppose the use of military force and believe any country's sovereignty should be respected," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesperson Hua Chunying told reporters in a briefing, avoiding mentioning the Jewish state by name. "China also calls on all relevant parties to begin from the basis of protecting regional peace and stability, maintain restraint and avoid taking any actions that would escalate tensions and jointly safeguard regional peace and stability," Hua said.

The comments came a day after the Israeli Air Force reportedly struck targets around Damascus that stored a shipment of advanced Iranian missiles en route to Hezbollah terrorists, in the second such attack in three days, raising the ire of Syria, Hezbollah, Iran and much of the Arab world.

Asked if China would urge Netanyahu to stop airstrikes, Hua said the Israeli prime minister had yet to meet Chinese leaders. Netanyahu was due in Beijing on Wednesday, following Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas's departure from the city a day earlier.

Netanyahu began his five-day China trip by checking out technological innovations in Shanghai.

Standing next to a wall displaying the logos of the companies operating in a high-tech park, Netanyahu expressed optimism regarding future business opportunities for Israel and China.

"We see here the logos of many of the world's leading companies," he said. "I hope that we will soon see on this wall the logos of many Israeli companies. This is the goal – to expand bilateral economic co-operation and significantly increase Israeli exports to China."

In a meeting with Israeli business leaders, Netanyahu said it was his job to represent their interests to the Chinese government.

Meeting with his Chinese counterpart Xi Jinping at the Great Hall of the People, the seat of China's legislature, on Sunday, Abbas reviewed the history of their peoples' relations stretching back to the 1960s and said the two shared the "same views on many world problems."

"I appreciate China's high position in the world nowadays," Abbas said in opening remarks at the meeting, which was followed by the signing of agreements on technical co-operation and cultural exchanges.

China recognized a Palestinian state in 1988, four years before establishing diplomatic ties with Israel.

China's Foreign Ministry said last week it would be willing to help set up a meeting between Abbas and Netanyahu if the two men wanted. Talks between the Israeli and Palestinian sides have been deadlocked for four years, and there was no indication a meeting would take place.

China has traditionally maintained a low profile in Middle East diplomacy, but in recent years has tried to play a more active role in the region as part of its quest for markets, resources and diplomatic influence. Beijing has sought stable relations with both sides in the Israel-Palestinian conflict, but has been criticized, along with Russia, by many for strongly opposing international intervention in Syria.

Canada courts Israeli business leaders

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Canada's Minister of Natural Resources Joe Oliver was in Israel last week to try to woo technology corporations here to collaborate with Canada in the fields of offshore natural gas, unconventional oil and gas, and science and technology.

Oliver's visit comes as Israel is moving closer to its goal of energy independence by tapping in to its offshore natural gas fields.

On May 2, natural gas exploration partners Delek Drilling and Avner Oil Exploration announced that the Leviathan field, located in the Mediterranean Sea off the Haifa coast, contains 19 trillion cubic feet of natural gas – 11 per cent more than their original estimate of 17 trillion.

The partners also announced that the Tamar gas field could yield about 13 million barrels of natural gas condensate, one of the raw materials used by the petrochemicals industry to refine fuels.

Speaking to The CJN, Oliver highlighted Canada's role as a secure energy supplier, and its commitment to energy diversification and modernizing major resource project approvals.

He said Canada wants to help Israel with technology and know-how in the energy field.

"Israel has tended to look to bigger countries like the United States, China and India, but what we'd like to do is to bring to bear expertise in an area which is going to be crucially important for Israel's security and growth," Oliver said in an interview in Tel Aviv.

Accompanied by a Canadian trade delegation and university academics, Oliver met with Israeli business leaders and policy experts to further explore trade and investment opportunities between Canada and Israel.

"On a number of fronts – conventional and unconventional oil and gas, renewable energy and energy efficiency – there are tremendous opportunities for Israel and Canada to work together, share expertise, transfer technology and create jobs," Oliver told Israeli business leaders. "Canada is open for business, and we want to expand our trade and investment with Israel, creating jobs, growth and long-term prosperity for Canadians."

Though Canada is by far the richer in natural resources, Oliver pointed out – more than once – that Israel's "startup nation" characteristic is highly sought after.

"Israel is very advanced," Oliver said in the interview. "Israel is strong in science and technology. They've got more PhDs per capita than any country in the world. What I wanted to do is to get the best and brightest of our two countries to look at areas of science and technology which are important to both countries."

While in Israel, Oliver also announced a call for proposals under the Canada–Israel Energy Science and Technology Fund (CIESTF).

Earlier this year, Natural Resources Canada announced $5 million over the next three years through its ecoENERGY Innovation Initiative to support this fund, which will also receive funding from the government of Israel on a project-by-project basis. Selected projects will address key challenges facing Canada's energy industry, and apply combined know-how to improve the efficiency and sustainability of this sector. Eligible projects will be led by industry and may include academic partners in both countries.

"This fund encourages the development of innovative energy technologies and processes, enabling the responsible development of unconventional oil and gas resources," Oliver said. "These projects will help create jobs, address shared environmental challenges and strengthen the economies of both countries."

The creation of CIESTF, managed and delivered by the Canada–Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation, will see Canada and Israel pursue further co-operation to advance shared energy interests.

Oliver said that "you can't time innovation," but he would like to see collaboration efforts between Israel and Canada come to fruition in the next few years.

"We want to reinforce a strong and diplomatic relationship in commerce. This is an area where Canada has experience and expertise and can add value," he said.

Oliver called for a reciprocal visit by Israeli businesses and government officials to Canada. "There are real opportunities for Israeli companies to come to Canada and see and meet with Canadian venture capital and investment firms and meet with Canadian companies to develop its resources."

1,000 people in Senegal mark Israeli Independence Day

JTA

DAKAR, Senegal — A crowd of 1,000 people celebrated Israel's 65th anniversary in the predominantly Muslim nation of Senegal.

"Israel very much values its warm ties with Senegal, which is an island of stability in an unstable region," Israel's ambassador to Senegal, Eli Ben-Toura, told the crowd of religious leaders, businessmen, artists and diplomats who gathered last week at Dakar's Grand National Theater to celebrate Israel's Independence Day.

Ben-Toura told JTA that Israel has trained hundreds of Senegalese farmers in advanced agricultural techniques over the years.

"Usually when African governments approach Israel, it's either about agriculture or defence systems," he said. "But we want to go further and believe that cultural exchange is also a major element."

The embassy arranged a modern dance performance by Ido Tadmor, the artistic director of the Israel Ballet, and 40 local dancers.

The Israeli Foreign Ministry is installing two experts in agriculture in Senegal as well as a depot service for equipment, Ben-Toura said. Israeli researchers are also trying to eradicate snail fever, a parasitic disease, in the country's north.

In December, the Senegalese government granted an oil exploration license to Elentilo, a mining company owned by the Israeli businessman Jacob Engel.

The Islamic insurgency that erupted last year in neighboring Mali has not affected Senegal's more liberal and pro-western society, Ben-Toura said, "but there is major concern and action on the part of Senegalese authorities to prevent radical Islam from trickling in."

Senegal severed its relations with Israel in the 1970s under pressure from Arab countries, along with most other African nations. Relations were restored in 1994, though Senegal does not have an embassy in Israel.

"The government is interested in opening one. There's recognition it needs to happen," Ben-Toura said.

Security concerns behind airstrikes on Syria, Israel says

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces' Northern Command head calmed fears that the weekend airstrikes against Syria have brought the country to the brink of war, while at the same time, Lebanon increased its military readiness along the border with Israel.

"There are no winds of war," Maj.-Gen. Yair Golan said on Monday as he took part in an annual fun run for the Golani Brigade, one of Israel's four main infantry brigades.

"There is no need to go into hysterics. Everything is calm, the residents of the north can sleep in peace," he said. "Do I look tense?"

The IDF reopened Israel's northern airspace for civilian flights after air traffic was brought to a standstill for a half a day following Sunday's airstrike on Syria. It was originally announced that Haifa's airport was to be closed until Thursday.

Syria issued harsh warnings that Israel should not dare to launch any further attacks after two airstrikes over the weekend apparently targeted Iranian-made missiles at facilities near Damascus. The Fateh-110 missiles were reportedly being transported to Hezbollah in Lebanon. Reports said the weapons storage facilities were hit by missiles fired from Israeli aircraft flying over Lebanon.

Israel Radio reported Monday that Lebanon put soldiers stationed along the border with Israel on alert, and local media said that Israeli Air Force planes were again spotted over the country. On Sunday, Lebanon called on the United Nations and the international community to pressure Israel over continued violations of Lebanese airspace.

An unnamed western government source claimed Sunday that Israel's alleged airstrike in Syria that day targeted sensitive military installations, including those staffed by members of the Iranian Revolutionary Guard. The report, carried by pro-Israel news site The Tower, was unconfirmed.

According to unnamed Israeli and American sources, Israeli planes struck sites outside Damascus early Friday, and again early Sunday, targeting weapons transfers from Iran to Hezbollah.

An Israeli official told the Los Angeles Times on Sunday that both strikes were carried out to thwart weapons transfers from Iran to Hezbollah, which would have given the Lebanese terror group a new missile capability.

"We are not taking sides and we're not interested in interfering in the internal affairs of Syria," the senior Israeli official said. "But we have to make sure these weapons do not fall into the hands of Hezbollah, because the minute that happens, it will be hard to track and monitor them. That's the only reason we interfered. If we don't take action now, we will be on the receiving end of those missiles. We have to act to guarantee our security, and that applies to Syria and Iran."

Also Sunday, Iranian army ground forces commander Ahmad Reza Pourdastan said Tehran was ready to support Syria and offer it aid in case of further Israeli strikes.

"Syria has a powerful army, and with the structure and experience it has against the Zionist regime, it can definitely defend itself and there is no need for intervention by other countries," Pourdastan said, according to the Iranian semi-official Fars news network. "But, if they do need training, we can help them."

Jews have no claim to Israel, Scottish church says

JTA

NEW YORK — The Church of Scotland published a paper denying that "scripture" provides a basis for Jewish claims to Israel.

The paper, "The Inheritance of Abraham," rejects, "claims that scripture offers any peoples a privileged claim for possession of a particular territory." It also states that "reconciliation can only be possible if the Israeli military occupation of the West Bank and east Jerusalem and the blockade of Gaza are ended."

The report was published online by the Church and Society Council of the Church of Scotland ahead of the church's general assembly on May 18. Its introduction said it's the council's "latest reflection on the 'questions that need to be faced,' as the political and humanitarian situation in the Holy Land continues to be a source of pain and concern for us all."

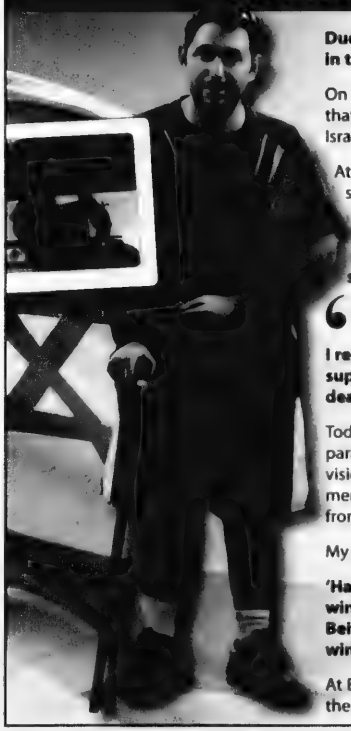
While the 10-page report does not mention the upcoming meeting, its final chapter, titled "Proposed Deliverance," calls on the church to "urge the U.K. Government and the European Union to use pressure to stop further expansion of Israeli settlements in the occupied West Bank."

The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities said May 3 that the paper is "an outrage to everything that interfaith dialogue stands for" and "reads like an Inquisition-era polemic against Jews and Judaism."

"The arrogance of telling the Jewish people how to interpret Jewish texts and Jewish theology is breathtaking," the Jewish council said.

The council further declared that the paper "closes the door on meaningful dialogue" and called on the church to withdraw it ahead of its forthcoming General Assembly.

REPAYING COURAGE BY REBUILDING LIVES



Dudi Saidof, a 24-year-old, was serving in the Border Police.

On August 11, 2003, Dudi's unit got word that a terrorist was trying to infiltrate into Israel. The country was on high alert!

At the check point, Dudi noticed a suspicious baby carriage. As he approached it, the terrorist set off the bomb remotely from his cell phone and unfortunately Dudi suffered the consequences ...

"The bomb blast had left me with a critical head and brain injury. I remained unconscious and on life support for three weeks. I was declared dead three times.

Today, the entire left side of my body is paralyzed, and my speech, hearing and vision are impaired. My short term memory has been affected and I suffered from epilepsy.

My rehabilitation is a daily struggle...

'Have faith in yourself, fight and you'll win' is my motto and inspiration. It is at Beit Halochem where I understand that winning can be a reality.

At Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv, I work out in the fitness room, swim in the Olympic-size heated pool, hand-bike cycle (using only one arm) and receive hydrotherapy treatments. Recently, I joined the wall climbing club. I spend a lot of time at the Young Veterans' Club, with those who were wounded in the Second Lebanon War and from Gaza's Operation Cast Lead.

Beit Halochem not only gives me the physical rehabilitation that I so desperately need, but it is a very special place where I can socialize with others who know and feel what I do. You never feel inferior there; we are all in this together. Beit Halochem has given me my life back. Today I have three homes: mine, my parents' and Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv."

Nazi influence in the Arab world

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

Nazi Germany's effort to recruit supporters in the Arab world is attracting new attention among scholars.

With the 70th anniversary of a Palestinian Arab leader's sabotage of a plan to rescue Jewish children from Europe coming up next month, Israeli scholar Edy Cohen spoke exclusively to JNS.org about his current research on the role of Nazi and Axis propaganda in the Middle East. Cohen, 41, is on the staff of the Israel State Archives.

During the Holocaust years, Haj Amin el-Husseini, better known as the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, lived in Berlin, where he recorded pro-Nazi radio broadcasts that were beamed to the Arab world and recruited Bosnian Muslims to join an all-Muslim unit of the SS.

Seventy years ago, on May 13, 1943, Husseini caught wind of a plan to permit 4,000 Jewish children, accompanied by 500 adults, to travel to Palestine in exchange for the release of 20,000 German prisoners of war. Both the Germans and the British had agreed to the exchange, but the Germans backed down when the Mufti objected.

The Mufti was the most prominent Arab figure to support the Nazis, but he was not alone. "My research tracks the effort by the Germans, Italians and Japanese to spread their propaganda and influence in Palestine and various Arab countries," said Cohen, who was born and raised in Beirut and immigrated to Israel in 1995. "They worked hard at it and, to a significant extent, they succeeded."

Cohen has been combing through Arabic-language Nazi and Axis leaflets and radio broadcasts that were collected and analyzed by Haganah intelligence in the 1930s and 1940s.

Some of the leaflets found by Cohen feature stark headlines such as "Kill the Jews and the British!" Some were printed on the back of facsimile British pounds or American dollars, so that when they were dropped by German planes over Arab regions of Palestine, they looked like money and immediately attracted attention.

According to Cohen, some of the Arabic-language Nazi propaganda promised that those who attacked Jews would be rewarded by being given "the most beautiful of the Jewish girls" after Palestine's Jewish community was vanquished. "That sort of language makes one think of the promise that Muslim terrorist leaders today sometimes offer – that those who die while killing Jews will receive 70 virgins in heaven," Cohen said.

The text of the leaflets and broadcasts were composed by Nazi authors, and then translated into Arabic by members of the Mufti's entourage in Berlin. Some of the Mufti's men in Germany were more than writers: several parachuted into Palestine in 1944 with vials of poison that they intended to dump in the Tel Aviv water system. They were intercepted by the British police before they could carry out the attack.

Haj Amin el-Husseini with Nazi SS officers in November 1943 (German Federal Archives)

Cohen found an internal memo from British police headquarters in Jerusalem in 1939 reporting, "The Arab population in Palestine are listening to the Berlin broadcasts in Arabic most attentively, particularly in town and village coffee shops where large crowds gather for the purpose." The report stated that the "uneducated classes are undoubtedly being influenced" by the Nazi propaganda.

In 1945, the activists known as the Bergson Group successfully lobbied the government of Yugoslavia to indict the Mufti as a war criminal, because of atrocities committed against Allied soldiers and civilians by members of the Bosnian Muslim SS unit, known as "Handschar," that he helped create. The Yugoslavs never took steps to extradite him, however.

Husseini fled Berlin during the final days of the war but was briefly detained by the French authorities and placed under house arrest in a Paris villa. In response to Arab pressure, the French permitted the Mufti to stage a faux escape, and he found haven in Cairo. Later he moved to Beirut, where he died in 1974.

Earlier this year, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas stirred controversy when, in a PA television broadcast, he listed the Mufti's name among a number of "martyrs and heroes" who have died while fighting Jews or Israelis.

Bunker buster upgrade

U.S. officials reportedly told Israel that the United States has improved weapons capable of destroying Iran's underground nuclear site in Fordow. The Wall Street Journal, quoting unnamed U.S. officials, reported that the United States had assured Israel that advanced features added to its bunker buster bombs vastly improved its ability to destroy underground facilities. The paper reported that the United States hopes the improved Massive Ordnance Penetrator, or MOP, will convince Israel to hold off on unilaterally attacking Iran and give Washington more time to address Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program diplomatically.

Borders 'precondition' rejected

Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni, has reportedly refused to accept the 1967 border as the basis for a final Israeli-Palestinian border prior to negotiations. Livni told U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry that Israel would not agree to the 1967 borders as a precondition of peace negotiations with the Palestinians, Maariv reported. Rather, she said, the border issue must be resolved through talks. U.S. President Barack Obama has called for resumption of negotiations "on the basis" of the 1967 borders, a reference widely interpreted as allowing for an agreement in which Jewish settlement blocs become Israeli territory in exchange for other areas. Earlier this week, the Arab League for the first time publicly cited the possibility of "comparable," mutually agreed and "minor" land swaps between the Israelis and the Palestinians.

Google recognizes 'Palestine'

Google has changed the title on the homepage of its Palestinian edition from "Palestinian Territories" to "Palestine." In a statement to the BBC last week, Google said it was "following the lead" of several bodies, including the United Nations, in adopting the change across its products. In November, the United Nations granted Palestine the status of "non-member observer state." The Palestinian Authority welcomed Google's decision, the BBC reported. Israel considers any formal use of the word Palestine as pre-judging the outcome of currently stalled peace talks.

Clashes erupt after murder

Israelis and Palestinians clashed in the West Bank more than a day after the murder of a Jewish man by a Palestinian attacker. Jews threw rocks at passing Palestinian cars. Jews and Palestinians threw rocks at each other in the northern West Bank on May 1, according to reports. Eviatar Borovsky, 31, a father of five from the Yitzhar settlement, was stabbed to death on April 30 as he waited for a bus at the Tapuach Junction. The stabber then took Borovsky's gun and began shooting at Border Guard officers. The officers returned fire, injuring the alleged Palestinian perpetrator, who was taken to an Israeli hospital to be treated for his wounds. Some 15 Jews were arrested for violence against Palestinians in the immediate aftermath of the stabbing. Files from JTA

Architecture business takes Diamond around the world

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Jack Diamond's architecture firm is downtown, but his business takes him around the world.

A couple of weeks ago, he was in his corner office, chatting with a prominent public figure about the proposed casino for Toronto – he's dead set against it. The day before, he flew in from St. Petersburg, Russia, where he was consulting about his design for the city's opera house, the New Mariinsky Theatre.

Architecture is now an international business. Firms from around the world were invited to bid on the project, but it was Diamond Schmitt Architects, the firm he co-founded, that was selected, based on its design, he said.

Jack Diamond

The St. Petersburg theatre is one of many of Diamond's projects that span the globe. Among the firm's completed designs are Jerusalem City Hall; Israel's Foreign Ministry building; the Sidney Harman Hall, the Harman Centre for the Arts in Jerusalem; plus other designs in Bulgaria, France, Ireland, China and the Caribbean.

As for the New Mariinsky Theatre, "it's a major project," he said. "It's the first opera house built in Russian since the czars."

Given that in Russia, concerts, operas and ballets are not an occasional diversion but a way of life, with hundreds of performances a year, Diamond and his team had to design not just the acoustically sophisticated hall, but also the production facilities where the opera's "back office" work is conducted.

In the end, said Diamond, "It's the most advanced opera house in the world."

Diamond's reputation and his accomplishments are well recognized in the architecture community. He's won numerous awards as testimony to that. Most recently, he was named recipient of the 2013 Lifetime Design Achievement Award from the Ontario Association of Architects. The award is presented to those firms that demonstrate "the best in architectural design and innovation."

World Architecture magazine has voted Diamond Schmitt one of the top 10 firms in the world in the cultural sector.

And in 2009, the firm was recognized by Deloitte LLP, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, KPMG and the Queen's University School of Business as one of Canada's 50 best managed companies.

The awards are nice, but the accolades that are most important to Diamond are those of his clients. And he believes he's earned those not just through designs that are pleasing to the eye, but they've got to work.

He's quite clear in distinguishing himself from other high-profile architects who relish in designs that are bold but not necessarily practical. He believes he has carved out a niche as someone who can deliver attractive properties, but at the promised cost and on time.

It's a competitive industry and Diamond believes "there are several ways in which we've succeeded." In building the business, "we're not slotted in any particular industry, because if that industry dies, you're dead."

Another important part of the company's business model is to not restrict oneself to a single country's economy. "That's why I've worked in several countries."

Over the years, he witnessed architectural firms overly reliant on one sector of the economy fall on hard times when that segment dried up. "I was determined that we would not be slotted or dependent on one sector or market," he said.

Winning bids on such projects demands design excellence, he continued, as well as cost control and on-time delivery.

It's important to oversee construction standards and the quality of materials so costs don't get out of hand, he said.

The firm employs five people just to ensure that materials and construction are done up to specifications in working drawings and other documentation.

"It's a tough game," Diamond said. "Contractors often tried to claim extras when they're not justified."

Diamond, a native of South Africa who earned his architecture degree at the University of Capetown, immigrated to Canada in the early 1960s. He worked as an academic for six years while he got his business up and running. It took him five years to score his first project at York Square. "In those days you got work through connections... social networks." Today, a computer program called MERX notifies firms of available projects.

It's a more level playing field, he said.

He also developed an intriguing theory about Jews and architecture. Jewish history, he suggests, is full of tensions between the spiritual and the material worlds. Architecture also has its contemplative, thoughtful side, but it must be geared to the practical social dimension.

Architects must design a building that "elevates life to something higher than the mundane," while dealing with budgetary and construction constraints, he contends.

Given its international reputation and the quality of the projects it tackles, Diamond Schmitt receives numerous applications from hopeful architects.

Diamond said the firm, which consists of 120 people, goes out of its way to "empower" people, soliciting their input on others' projects and constantly upgrading everyone's skills. "The bench strength here is unparallelled," and turnover is extremely low, he said.

A weekly lunch and learn lecture series aids in team building, as does a soup day in which each member of the firm, twice a year, prepares a fresh soup on the premises that employees share.

The result of these management practices can be seen in the bottom line. Diamond Schmitt has "been doing remarkably well... I must say we are satisfied with the financial aspect of the firm," he said.

Disparate people linked during terrorist threat

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

A terrorist threat in Jerusalem sets off a chain of events that weave together the lives of an American journalist, an Israeli war hero, a Christian-Arab grocer, a Palestinian farmer and a budding terrorist.

This is the setting of A Vision of Angels (Owl Canyon Press) by Timothy Jay Smith, an award-winning author who lived in Jerusalem for two years.

Tensions run high from the beginning of the book. The action takes place during the week leading up to Easter, which coincides with Passover.

A suicide bomber on Jaffa Street leaves 10 dead and 15 injured; Palestinians are protesting their forced removal from a settlement in Ramallah; and an Israeli raid on a mosque during a mullah's provocative speech causes a mass stampede. And now, Israeli intelligence gets wind of a planned bomb attack in Jerusalem on Easter Sunday.

Smith populates his book with colourful characters. David Kessler is an American journalist who wants to give conflict a human face. He previously worked in Somalia, Bosnia, Iraq and Afghanistan, and now finds himself in Israel covering the Mideast conflict. He is old fashioned enough to still use film for his pictures.

Major Jakov Levy is an Israeli war hero, "the saint of Sinai," who, under pressure from the chief of staff to keep the potential terrorists out of Israel, closes the border with the Gaza Strip.

"Another bomb and we may have to close down the National Tourism Office," he's warned.

Meanwhile, at home, he is embarrassed by his 22-year-old son, Mishe, who's a peace activist.

Issa is a grocer who works in the Old City. He's a Christian, married to a Muslim and finds himself unwittingly caught in the stampede outside the mosque as he tries to rescue his father-in-law.

Amin Mousa is an Oxford-educated Palestinian farmer. Mousa is an informant, striking a deal with Jakov to provide information in exchange for passes to let his fruit trucks get through checkpoints without delay.

Mohammed is a 15-year-old whose brother was a Hamas fighter killed by Israeli soldiers. He now wants to help Hamas stage its next attack, determined to prove himself.

The author provides vivid, colourful description. You could almost smell the over-ripe tomatoes stacked in crates and hear the buzzing of flies that surround them.

The suspenseful plot moves very quickly. Hamas militants, unable to smuggle their bomb across the closed border, devise a plan to smuggle it out in David's car, but he's unexpectedly detoured on the way.

One of the cell members confesses to this plot, and the race is on to find David and retrieve the bomb, before the terrorists can get it.

Like his journalist character, Smith tries to give the different sides of this conflict a human face. The stories of all these characters and their families are slowly interwoven together before a climactic ending that is ultimately one of hope.

A Vision of Angels will be in stores in early July.

Book helps kids understand what death means

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

Discussing death with young children can be brutal, but it's a discussion that has to happen eventually. It's a crucial conversation, too, for it arms kids with information they will need in order to process what death means.

It can be helpful to impart this information with a good book on hand, and Stones for Grandpa (KarBen, 2013) by Renee Londner beautifully handles the pain and anxiety surrounding death, conveying the power of memory as a source of comfort and permanence.

Londner wrote Stones for Grandpa after the death of her husband, using the voice of a young boy. The book begins a year after the death of the boy's grandfather, as he makes his way to the cemetery to unveil the tombstone. "I still miss him," the child reflects. "Mommy says the first year is the hardest."

He goes through his memories of his grandfather, using the Jewish holidays as his benchmarks. "It was the first Chanukkah without Grandpa spinning his lucky dreidel," he recalls.

Each holiday features vibrant illustrations by Martha Aviles depicting celebrations and milestones where his grandfather once took an active role, but over the past year was dearly missed.

He takes out a memory box his mother gave him after his grandfather's death, containing favourite photographs and meaningful memorabilia. The box triggers more memories of special moments the two of them shared – starwatching, tying knots and learning to overcome fear.

Though he relishes the memories, the child is afraid of their transience. "What if my memories get lost?" he asks his mother.

"Memories of someone you love never get lost," she responds.

The story returns to the cemetery and the unveiling ceremony, where visitors are placing stones on the gravesite. The air is filled with laughter and tears as everyone shares stories.

The book ends on a positive note, as the child begins to understand that his memories go far beyond the memory box, that they're contained inside him and will never disappear. He understands that life goes on after someone you love has died, and that while it's okay to miss them and feel sad about their absence, it's also possible to draw strength and joy from your memories of them.

Stones for Grandpa offers a carefully written, thoughtful resource for parents teaching their three-to-seven-year-olds about death in a particularly Jewish context. For kids who have experienced the loss of a loved one, this book may offer solace and ideas for how to cope as they move forward.

Vintage comedian deserves the accolades of his many peers

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

"There's no one like Mel," says a gushing admirer in reference to Mel Brooks, the standup comedian, screenwriter, film director and Broadway producer. "He's one of a kind."

Brooks, in fact, is not unique. But after 60 years in show business, he is indisputably one of its most talented figures.

Having earned a slew of major awards, he's one of only 14 entertainers who has won an Emmy, Grammy, Oscar and Tony. So Brooks, who always craved attention and recognition, richly deserves the accolades of his peers.

He gets it in Susan Lacy's PBS biopic, Mel Brooks: Make a Noise, which will be broadcast on May 20 at 9 p.m. It covers just about all the bases, but comes up short in dealing with his childhood and early career.

There is precious little about his youth in Brooklyn, where he was born and where he was known as Melvin Kaminsky, the son of European immigrants. There is even less about his halcyon Borscht Belt days, when he refined his craft in front of Jewish vacationers in upstate New York resorts.

Nonetheless, Mel Brooks is fairly satisfying as biopics go.

Brooks, sitting in an empty room and prompted by the interviewer, recalls his entry into the business, his modus operandi as a comedian, his involvement in a myriad of projects from Blazing Saddles to The Producers, and his 40-year marriage to the Italian-American actress Anne Bancroft.

He speaks rapidly and funnily and, in some instances, he resorts to self-deprecating humour to describe himself as "arrogant" and "obnoxious."

Brooks says he was destined to be an entertainer when, at the age of nine, he attended a Broadway show, starring the irrepressible Ethel Merman, and loved it.

He discloses he learned the art of comedy writing on Your Show of Shows, which starred Sid Caesar. He specialized in "life sketches" and focused on both the bizarre and the commonplace, he notes.

After his first marriage broke up, he adds, he cried incessantly and considered suicide.

In an aside, Brooks says he feels "terribly Jewish" and likes being Jewish, but offers no elaboration.

He also makes a point of saying he writes for himself, not others.

In discussing Blazing Saddles, Brooks agrees it shattered Western movie conventions. In reflecting on Young Frankenstein, he says he insisted on filming it in black and white to achieve a greater degree of authenticity.

He debunks his skills as an actor, but calls himself a "smart comedian," a description that is bang on.

Mel Brooks in stellar form

He says he parodied Adolf Hitler in The Producers out of a desire to ridicule the Nazi dictator. Nathan Lane, the star of that mega Broadway hit, says it succeeded because it was that "rare" production when "all the right people come together at the same time."

Lacy throws in scraps of information from his boyhood. Brooks grew up in "real poverty" after his father died and his mother had to scrounge around for a living. "I loved my mother," he says softly.

The late Bancroft, in an archival clip, speaks fondly of their courtship ("the man never left me alone, thank God") and sweetly says that Brooks looked like her father and acted like her mother.

In closing, he gratefully acknowledges having received every possible award, except, of course, The Woman of the Year prize.

BORN TO KVETCH AUTHOR PLANS TO TRANSLATE CLASSIC YIDDISH NOVEL

Joseph Opatoshu was one of the Yiddish language's most significant writers, but few readers have had the opportunity of reading his work, a situation that Toronto author Michael Wex is hoping to change. Opatoshu is "like the Yiddish equivalent of Hemingway or Fitzgerald in terms of influence, but he hardly exists in English," Wex lamented.

A Yiddish maven and author of the 2005 bestseller Born to Kvetch and other books, Wex is hoping to bring new attention to Opatoshu by translating into English his 1921 novel In the Forests of Poland, which he describes as "the most important Yiddish novel of the 20th century."

The new translation "will change everybody's views of Jewish life in Poland," he said, adding that his own plan to fund the translation project may transform the way such forgotten classics are translated in future.

This week Wex intends to enlist financial support for the translation from lovers of Jewish literature through an online funding campaign on the Indiegogo website. His eventual goal is to publish the translation as a cost-free PDF or e-book. "I'm going to try to finance it as an Indiegogo project. The contributors will basically be making a present of the book to anyone with access to a computer or e-book reader."

Indiegogo is an international "crowdfunding" site where people attempt to raise money for film, music, art, charitable and other projects and causes. Wex's Indiegogo site was slated to go live on May 7 and remain active for a month.

BBC Cancels Broadcast: The British Broadcasting Corporation is being criticized for its last-minute decision to cancel the broadcast of the Israeli documentary film Exile: A Myth Unearthed, about the Jewish exodus from Jerusalem in 70 CE. The film, by director Ilan Ziv, was featured in the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in April and has also been shown on Canadian television.

The film hypothesizes that many Jews stayed in Jerusalem after the destruction of the Temple and are the ancestors of some present-day Palestinians. According to a story from JTA, the BBC said the film did "not fit editorially" with its season and its professed theme of exploring the history of archeology.

Simon Plosker of the watchdog agency HonestReporting suggested the BBC dropped the documentary so as not to upset anti-Israel elements "by showing a film with such a heavy concentration on Jewish history in the Land of Israel." The BBC has often come under fire in the past from supporters of Israel for its coverage of the events in the Middle East.

Israel moves up in IIHF ranking after gold medal win

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel knocked off tournament favourites China and New Zealand, won four out of five games and captured the gold medal at the International Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) Division II B tournament in Izmit, Turkey recently. With the win, Israel is promoted into Division II A next year.

Israel entered the tournament after a disappointing result last year, in which they finished fifth. But led by the top line of Oren Eizenman, Daniel Erlich and Max Birbraer, the Israelis cruised to the gold medal.

They secured top spot even before closing out the competition with a loss to Mexico. Israel finished ahead of Bulgaria, Mexico, New Zealand, China and Turkey.

"That's the best club we've have," said head coach Jean Perron. "I'm not talking about talent. I'm talking about team discipline, hard work and the way the guys played together, the chemistry. It was very good."

Perron, who coached the Montreal Canadiens to a Stanley Cup win in 1986, has served as coach of the Israelis for several years, leading them to a gold medal in 2005.

Over the years, the success of the Israeli national team depended on which top players were available at the time. Going into Turkey, IIHF observers saw the team as an unknown entity. But with Erlich, who played for the University of Western Ontario after seasons with the Barrie Colts and London Knights of the OHL, Eizenman, who has played in the AHL and the BCHL and Birbraer, a New Jersey draftee who played in the British elite league, the team was poised to surprise.

"We started the tournament by upsetting the good clubs, China and New Zealand," Perron said on the phone from Quebec. "That gives you confidence."

"From then on we had good goaltending and a good environment for the guys too."

Perron said the Israelis took hold of the tournament by excelling on the power play. In five games the Israelis scored 19 goals in 42 man-advantage situations, for a stunning success rate of 45.24 per cent.

"They tried to run us, we stayed disciplined and capitalized on the power play," Perron said.

Eizenman, who centred Erlich on right wing and Birbraer on left, said Perron changed their line for the power play. He and Birbraer played the points, while Erlich was joined by Sergei Frankel and Daniel Mazour up front. "There was a lot of puck movement... It was one of the biggest factors in winning," Eizenman said.

"We drew a lot of penalties, just from our speed and creativity," he added. "I think we were clearly the best team in the event, from goaltending to defense."

Avishai Geller, who played forward on the team, recruited Erlich for the event. "In the last minute I decided to go and it turned out to be a great experience," he said.

Perron "gave [the top line] lots of leeway to do what we wanted... We all played really high-level hockey and we knew what to do."

While Israel continues to rely on North American-trained players, Perron believes the hockey talent being developed in Israel itself is getting better year by year. He singled out young defensemen Raanan Moscovich, Shai Maaravi and Evgeni Margoulis in particular. He credited assistant coach Dusan Kralik, a former Czech national junior player, for preparing the defense and getting the most out of the young players.

Israeli Avihu Sorotzky was named best goalie of the tournament. Erlich and Eizenman were first and second in scoring, with Erlich notching 7 goals and 16 assists for 23 points while Eizenman got 8 goals and 10 assists for 18 points. Erlich scored 11 points in a 13-2 rout of Bulgaria.

Though Israel and Turkey are experiencing somewhat chilly relations, that did not manifest itself in the tournament. Everything was run in a first class manner, Perron and Eizenman said.

Only one minor incident occurred. As the Israeli national anthem was being played after the victory over China, some fans began heckling. Arena personnel escorted the fans out of the venue and afterwards, officials of the Turkish hockey federation personally apologized for the slight, Perron said.

100 shoot hoops for needy Israelis

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

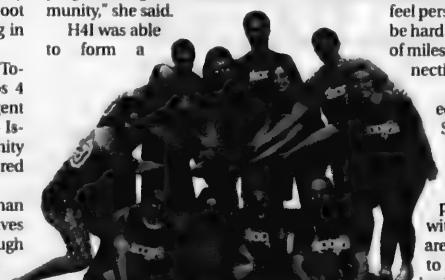
More than 100 players from across the GTA, as well as from Dundas and Hamilton, got together recently at the Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, Ont., to shoot hoops and raise money for Israelis living in poverty.

Hosted by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Connect, the Hoops 4 Israel (H4I) event raised $45,000 for indigent and unemployed residents of Bat Yam – Israel's fastest growing Ethiopian community where 40 per cent of youth are considered at-risk.

Since 2007, H4I has raised more than $550,000 and directly enhanced the lives of hundreds of Ethiopian-Israelis through sports and educational programs. This year, participants were divided into 18 male teams and six female squads. In addition to the main 3-on-3 competition, there was a free throw challenge for fans to win great prizes.

Ashley Kochman, Lesley Suchter, Amy Wilchesky, Alex Baker and Laura Anava were crowned women's champions. Mateusz Zio, Igor Lebov, Jacob Anidjar and Isaac Maresky were tops among the men.

In 2013, the H4I committee took their event to the next level, seeking not only to benefit Israeli children but local Torontonians as well, said Jessica Taylor, manager of innovative initiatives at Community Connect. "The Hoops 4 Israel team has begun to 'Live the Cause' as we create opportunities for young adults to get involved directly in programming for children in our community," she said.



H4I was able to form a partnership with JCC Chai Sports, and together they hosted two free basketball workshops that brought together more than 60 kids in grades 1 through 8 and 20 volunteers.

"At Hoops 4 Israel, our cause is kids," said Lisa Winberg, one of the H4I committee members. "We wanted to come up with a Live the Cause event that would allow the young professionals involved in H4I to interact and engage with children in a meaningful way."

She said Live the Cause is important "because it is a way for young professionals to feel personally connected to the cause. It can be hard to feel a bond with a child thousands of miles away, so we sought to build this connection locally."

The basketball clinics were promoted through the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Jewish Family & Child and Chai Lifeline in order to reach kids who may not otherwise be able to participate in such recreational programs. "By connecting volunteers with kids in our local community, we are bringing the spirit of Hoops 4 Israel to life and ensuring that the passion for basketball and making a difference continues to grow," Winberg said.

Aside from hosting the tournament, Community Connect volunteers also ran a stem cell and bone marrow drive at the venue. Players and spectators were encouraged to get a simple cheek swab to see if they could be potential donors.

The Israeli group Hadag Nahash provided musical entertainment and a local dance troupe put on a special cheerleading break.

Leipsic led league in regular season

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

As the Portland Winterhawks prepared to face off against the Edmonton Oil Kings for the Western Hockey League (WHL) championship, Portland forward Brendan Leipsic stood fifth in playoff scoring.

Not too shabby, but that paled in comparison to his regular season exploits: the Winnipeg-born skater led "The Dub" in points, scoring 49 goals and 71 assists for 120 points in 68 games. He finished tied with teammate Nicholas Petan at the top of the scoring derby but earned the title with three more goals scored (in three fewer games).

Heading into the final round of WHL playoffs, with the winners to advance to the Memorial Cup, the five-foot-nine 170-pound centre had 20 points – seven goals and 13 assists in 15 games. Teammate Ty Rattie led Western league playoff scorers with 31 points.

The Nashville Predators selected Leipsic in the third round, 89th overall, in the 2012 NHL Entry Draft. That same year he was named Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year.

Ottawa fights bid to take UN agency from Montreal

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The federal government, the province of Quebec and the city of Montreal, are rallying to prevent the city from losing the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), a United Nations agency, to Qatar.

The Gulf emirate is making an aggressive bid to become the new world headquarters of the ICAO, which has been located in Montreal since its founding in 1947.

Qatar's fellow Arab states are reportedly coalescing to help Qatar obtain the needed 60 per cent majority among the ICAO's 191 member countries.

Long dissatisfied with the Harper government's strong support of Israel, they are said to be especially motivated on this issue because of anger over Baird's meeting with Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni in east Jerusalem during his Middle East trip last month.

The lease is due on the ICAO's downtown University Avenue premises in 2016, and Qatar is expected to formally present its proposal by May 13 so that it can be considered at the ICAO general assembly to be held in Montreal this fall.

Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird "will fight tooth and nail to keep the ICAO in its rightful home of Montreal," said his press secretary, Rick Roth.

Roth told The CJN that Baird spoke to Qatar's prime minister, Hamad bin Jassem Al-Thani, twice in the last week to express Ottawa's opposition to the Qatari bid.

"He has contacted counterparts in other countries seeking their support," Roth said. "And he is working with representatives of the provincial and municipal governments, because all three levels of government have a role to play."

A senior government source, who wished to remained unnamed, told The CJN that the way Qatar has gone about this demonstrates why it's not a suitable host for a UN organization.

"Look at how Qatar has come and put this bid together at the 11th hour. It raises serious concerns about them buying off countries with bribes and bags of cash – something any country that respects the rule of law would never do. We will continue to promote a principled foreign policy."

Oil- and gas-rich Qatar has reportedly sweetened its bid by offering to build a new ultra-modern facility in Doha, its capital and largest city, and to subsidize the agency's operations.

The ICAO oversees standards related to civil air transport and its development worldwide.

The presence of the ICAO brings both prestige and considerable economic benefits to Montreal and Quebec.

Roth noted that the ICAO provides 600 direct and 1,200 indirect jobs to the city, and more than $100 million in spinoffs. Its University Avenue building, which opened in 1996, was constructed especially to accommodate the growing agency and is now the hub of the growing Quartier International.

Roth said Baird phoned Montreal Mayor Michael Applebaum and they have agreed to work together with the province, business and other interested sectors to promote the city as the best place for the ICAO.

"By every means at its disposal, Canada will fight to highlight the benefits and advantages of staying in Montreal," Roth said. "The ICAO has been in Montreal for as long as the UN has been in New York. It's a natural home."

On May 2, Baird received unanimous consent from the House of Commons for a motion endorsing Montreal as "the rightful host" of the ICAO's headquarters.

The U.S. representative on the ICAO's governing council, Duane Woerth, said his country will opposed any relocation. Peter Subissati, director of political and public affairs at the Israeli consulate, said Israel's position is that the ICAO should remain in Montreal.

Support for the status quo has also come from the industry. On May 2, Aéroports de Montréal (ADM), which manages Trudeau and Mirabel airports, delivered an impassioned plea against any move, noting the economic benefits and that the presence of the ICAO has attracted other international bodies in the field of civil aviation to Montreal.

"If the ICAO's headquarters were to move to Qatar, this would severely penalize Airports Council International [a body that represents all the world's major airports, which recently moved to Montreal] and the many other aviation-related organizations established in Montreal," stated ADM president and chief executive officer James Cherry.

"We are an aviation and aerospace city, and the headquarters of the ICAO must remain in Montreal where it belongs."

The National Airlines Council of Canada, which speaks for Canada's major airlines, also came out against any change.

The International Transport Workers Federation has forcefully voiced its opposition, raising the matter of the emirate's repression of human rights.

Convicted terrorist speaks at UBC

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — University of British Columbia students who attended a May 4 conference held by the Social Justice Centre, a campus club sponsored by the school's Alma Mater Society, listened to the voice of a convicted terrorist when Leila Khaled addressed the conference via Skype.

Khaled, 68, was convicted of terrorism for carrying out hijackings in 1969 and 1970 for the Palestinian Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). She has been called the "poster girl of Palestinian militancy."

Frank Dimant, CEO of B'nai Brith Canada, said UBC abdicated its responsibility to stop Khaled from having the opportunity to "poison the minds of Canadian students."

He added: "Her presence, even if only by video, adds to the real risk of students being influenced by radical ideologies, especially at a time when home-grown Canadian terrorism is a major concern."

The Social Justice Centre is a resource group of the AMS and completely independent from the university, said Lucie McNeill, director of public affairs at UBC.

"The university does recognize its responsibility in creating a safe and respectful environment for all on our campuses. The AMS does not represent the University of British Columbia," she said.

"It should be clear that UBC as an institution does not in any way sponsor or support the views expressed at events like this one. UBC is merely providing a safe environment for free speech and respectful debate."

But Dimant said that giving Khaled a platform at a UBC affiliated event is "absurd. Given recent events such as the arrest of two individuals in connection to a plot to bomb a Via Rail train, the horrific Boston Marathon attacks and the continuing investigation into the radicalization of youths from London, it is the responsibility of the university, as well as every Canadian, to speak out when it comes to security and safety."

Neither the AMS nor the Social Justice Centre responded to calls for comment before The CJN's deadline.

Eizenman takes hockey skills to Japan and Korea

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There are some aspects of hockey that don't necessarily translate well into other languages.

For instance, how do you say "faceoff" in Japanese?

Or "switch sides" in Korean? How about, "fore check?"

And then there are the more nuanced aspects of the gentleman's game that crop up now and then, such as "face wash" and, "you wanna go?"

Despite spending the last year playing for the Nippon Paper Cranes in the Asia League Ice Hockey – that's how it's described on its web site – Oren Eizenman admits he hasn't picked up all the subtler hockey expressions in the Japanese language. He understood some of his coach's instructions, like when he was asked to switch sides when he played the point on a power play. But for the other stuff he had to rely on the team interpreter, who attended practices and even has a place behind the bench during games.

"It's a very interesting dynamic," Eizenman said.

Having an interpreter at the bench is one of the nice perks provided by the Paper Cranes, making his hockey experience in the Asia league that much more enjoyable.

Truth be told, games in Asia are less gritty and abrasive than the ones played in North America. The ice surfaces are larger, making for games that stress skating, passing and skill, not in-your-face intimidation. "It's a very fast game with less contact" than the North American variety, he said.

And that suits Eizenman just fine. A natural centre, he has staked out a career on style and finesse, though playing in the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL) and the American Hockey League (AHL), he wasn't afraid to dig for the puck in the corners.

In the season just concluded with the Nippon Paper Cranes – they take their name from their corporate sponsors – he scored 13 goals and added 25 assists for 38 points in an injury-hampered season.

The year before with High 1 in Seoul, South Korea, he scored 63 points in 36 games. The seven-city league has teams in Japan, South Korea and China.

Before his Asia adventure, Eizenman,

Oren Eizenman bears down on the puck.

28, enjoyed a lengthy career in the ECHL and the AHL. Name a place and he's been there. He's played for Connecticut Whale, Syracuse Crunch, Milwaukee Admirals, San Antonio Rampage and the Manitoba Moose in the AHL. His longest stint was 33 games with the Whale in 2010-11. But, as he reminds, it was only one phone call away from a call-up to the Whale's NHL affiliate, the New York Rangers.

In the ECHL, he spent most of his time with the Fresno Falcons and the Stockton Thunder. Career wise, in 148 ECHL games, he scored 58 goals and added 104 assists for 162 points. In 82 AHL games, he scored six goals and added nine assists.

A dual Canadian and Israeli citizen, he's also represented Israel at IIHF tournaments, usually playing on the top line. For more about this year's event in Izmit, Turkey, see our sports page.

Playing in Seoul and Kushiro, Japan, has been a blast, he said. "It's been a great experience to go and live in those places for a couple of years."

There are only two North American skaters permitted on each team, so for Eizenman to make the cut is a testament to his ability. "It's a difficult league to get into. It's a really coveted job in the hockey world," he said.

The upside for those who make it is that the pay is even better than in European pro leagues. There, North Americans can earn high five figure or six figure salaries, tax free, along with free accommodation and use of a car, plus other benefits.

So how did he end up in the Far East?

"Originally, I did go because when I left North America, I was looking anywhere and the financial offer came from a team in Seoul. I thought it would be interesting to live in Asia.

"At first, I went in blind, but I had heard good things."

Eizenman was pleased with the hockey experience. Everything there is top quality, he said.

A drawback in both countries, he continued, is that "not everybody speaks English. I tried to learn the language but it is very different."

Making the situation even more intriguing is that the Cranes' head coach named him assistant captain, even though he could barely speak Japanese.

"They saw that I'm a lead-by-example kind of player," he said. And he served as an antidote to a malaise that sometime plagued the team. "The team had a tendency to get down if things were not going so well and get into a downward spiral… If the team saw that Oren was not worried, so they didn't worry either."

At the cultural level, Eizenman admits the adjustment was at times difficult, but "I learned a lot about their cultures. I learned a lot about myself and grew from the experience."

One of the big differences in Japan was a pervasive deference to authority. The coach's word was law and even young players had to do what the older ones demanded. That's a far cry from the Canadian attitude, let alone the Israeli one, which is, ahem, not that impressed with authority.

Eizenman's teammates on the Cranes came to know him as both an Israeli and a Canadian, but few had a clue about Jewish people. "People couldn't even comprehend what Judaism is," he said.

His teammates were curious and he did his best to explain it to them. "I became really close to almost all my teammates. People ask, how did you communicate? There's a way to use the basic words in their language and they use the basic words in your language."

Eizenman has also come to believe the truism that 90 per cent of communications is non-verbal.

And that just proved another truism, that sport transcends different cultures, so that you don't have to know how to say "face wash" in Japanese to get along.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

It was Oct. 30, 1971. I was 13 years old, and I was about to lose something I enjoyed every day. The folding of the Toronto Telegram was my first exposure to the end of a newspaper. And now, almost 42 years later, we are about to lose something unique: The CJN.

I experienced the biggest laugh of my life while watching the 1982 movie Airplane II. One of the characters was talking about something important that was in all the papers – the New York Times, the Washington Post, and the Canadian Jewish News. The CJN had made it to mainstream Hollywood.

In my university days, I wrote for, and was co-editor of, the Jewish student newspaper, Images, a joint effort of Jewish students from the University of Toronto and York University. Secretly, I had a desire to write for The CJN.

In the summer of 2010, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat was looking for something a bit different for a monthly column to occupy the inside back page of the paper. I spoke to him about the topic of the environment and sustainability, and from that conversation, the Sustainable Jew was born.

When the column started to appear on a regular basis in January 2011, my hope was that by facilitating a better understanding of the various sources of greenhouse gas pollution, the column would inspire personal, community and business action toward becoming "Sustainable Jews."

Over the last 2-1/2 years, I wrote about various aspects of sustainability.

I shared stories with you about many interesting people with diverse experiences and backgrounds, in our community and in Israel.

I spoke on the topic of sustainability at a number of local Jewish day schools, and watched as students and staff of these schools worked together to bring new ideas forward and tried to make a difference to our world.

Some synagogues began to take action on sustainability. Some looked at ways to generate money by taking advantage of the then-lucrative solar-energy programs offered by the Ontario government. Other synagogues and organizations began to look at their own operations and found ways to reduce energy consumption and hold the line on cost increases as energy rates fluctuated.

Another new opportunity is about to open through creative matchmaking. I recently attended a session, sponsored by the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Fund, which brought together representatives from the Canadian oil sands industry and representatives selected Israeli companies with expertise in treating wastewater and other byproducts of the resource extraction process. The opportunity to improve our world is enormous.

The end of The CJN will save trees and the energy used to create new and recycled newsprint. But The CJN's ability to inform and engage the community will be missed.

I want to thank my family, my loyal readers and Mordechai for the opportunity to write for paper. May we continue this journey for tikkun olam in the electronic edition of The CJN or its eventual successor.

Salt & pepper to taste

Place cherries, margarine, vinegar, honey in saucepan; bring to a boil. Reduce to simmer; cook until mixture has reduced, about 10 min. While sauce is simmering, whisk cornstarch and water together in small bowl; stir into cherry mixture. Bring back to simmer, stirring until thickened, about 5 min. Remove from heat.

Preheat broiler; sprinkle salmon with salt and black pepper; place skin sides down on broiling pan. Broil 30 sec.; remove from broiler and spoon the cherry glaze generously over fillets. Continue back under broiler, until salmon is opaque 8-10 min. Remove, reglaze with cherry sauce once or twice more during cooking. Let salmon stand before serving. Spoon extra cherry sauce before serving.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Shabbat dinner was winding down, and the family's guest excused herself from the table. She lay down on the couch in the den and adjusted the pillow so her head was propped up sufficiently to read The CJN – her favourite publication.

"The Six Day War was a military miracle," she read. The entire issue covered the war. She learned about Jewish bravery. She also learned that community members had lined up to give their jewelry to the United Jewish Appeal for the war effort. The guest dozed off and The CJN slipped onto the floor.

Monday morning came. Oded gulped down his breakfast. Shoe sales were dipping, and he had to make it to work early. On the way out, he noticed The CJN on the floor in the family room. He put it in his briefcase. The subway was busy, but he found a seat.

Oded opened The CJN and flipped to Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut's commentary. He had known little about the "Boat People" from Vietnam, other than that Canada was embracing them as refugees. Rabbi Plaut eloquently weaved a story about a family that had arrived in Toronto the week before, sponsored by the Jewish community. The man smiled and stuffed the paper in his briefcase.

The woman took a break from her sewing machine. She had filled her quota of shoes and wanted to review the advertisements in the Jewish newspaper the boss brought to work every week. She took a seat in the lunchroom. She read: "Good family in the Manor looking for full-time help. Hours and pay excellent." Her sister had just arrived from Italy. She tucked the ad into her pocket and would show it to her sibling later on.

Time wore on. The young man was tired. He dropped by the cafeteria and noticed The CJN on a table. Not a week went by when he wouldn't read Canada's national Jewish newspaper cover to cover. He was interested in everything from the community's relationship with the government to features on the NHL's only Jewish hockey player. He rolled up the paper and took it home.

That night he opened The CJN. The headlines shouted out: "Soviet Jews coming home." He read about Operation Exodus, a Jewish Agency program to bring hundreds of thousands of Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel. He read with nachas about the Israel Defence Forces and the American Joint Distribution Committee rescues in Azerbaijan and Odessa, and the courage of Jews assisting with Operation Exodus. It reminded him of CJN articles years earlier about the Raid on Entebbe. It was late. The man fell asleep. The CJN slipped to the floor.

Marky's restaurant was closing. Conversion was under scrutiny in Israel again. Canadian Jewish Congress was no more. The man's sister sipped her coffee and flipped through The CJN. A personal ad caught her eye. She was looking for a shidduch. Rosh Hashanah was here again, and she quite liked the honey chicken recipe she saw in the paper. Shaarei Tefillah was advertising seats. She saw an article about the community's gay and lesbian High Holiday services. She circled it and made a mental note to tell her brother.

June 27, 2013. It was a cool Montreal morning. The elderly Jew waited for The CJN to arrive. The day would be long and sad without it.

Making the most of confined quarters

Small spaces seem larger with convertible and custom furniture

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The trick to making a small condominium liveable is to make the most of the available space, says decorator Maureen Weigen-Liebovitz.

She advises planning the use of the space before moving day, especially for people downsizing, because often their older furniture may be be too bulky for their new home.

"It's important to make sure the scale of furniture is a good fit with the condo. The proportion has to be right for the space."

All the space must have a clear function, and sometimes a single space may have multiple functions, she says, explaining that much of the furniture being designed for condos often has a variety of uses.

She points to Resource Furniture's (www.resourcefurniture.com) Goliath console table, which measures 19 by 39 inches, but converts to a 9-1/2-foot dining table with five leaves.

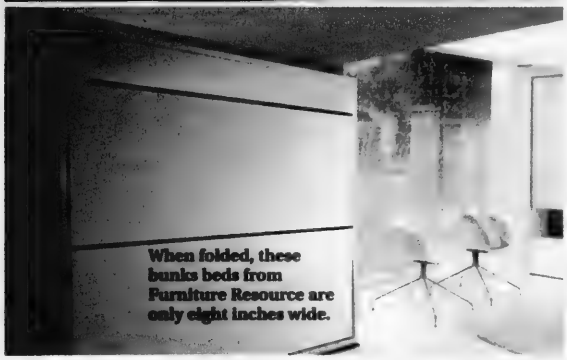
Seamus Butterly, a sales associate at Resource Furniture (416-901-7555), says all the furniture pieces in the showroom (366 Adelaide St. E.) have more than one function to maximize space.

The company, which is based in New York, specializes in wall-bed units, and Butterly is quick to demonstrate the speed at which a room changes.

"It goes from home office to guest bed in two seconds," he says. As he pulls a lever, the desk swings into the wall and down comes a fully made bed.

He notes that the furniture is manufactured in Italy, and each piece is customized. Buyers can choose from an array of colours and finishes, such as oak veneer, paint or melamine, with varying price points.

The units are also modular, so features such as cupboards and additional shelving can be added.



When folded, these bunks beds from Furniture Resource are only eight inches wide.

"The Italians have been making these units for 50 years. They use the best mechanics. We're known as the Mercedes of wall bed systems."

He says empty nesters tend to choose higher-end designs and finishes, while the simpler melamine styles appeal to first-time homebuyers.

Resource Furniture also offers designs for children's rooms that include bunk beds and desks that convert to twin beds.

Weigen-Liebovitz (www.decoratingvision.com) stresses the importance of measuring a room before considering wall-bed units, because they won't fit into some of the smaller condo bedrooms However, she says there are other space-saving solutions for beds beyond conventional convertible couches.

Urban Mode (www.urbanmode.com), a contemporary furniture store in the Queen and Bathurst area (145 Tecumseth Ave.), offers a variety options for duo purpose beds. The store carries a Canadian brand of ottomans in a 28-inch width that convert to single, double and queen size beds.

According to Myrlene Sundberg, co-owner of Urban Mode (416-591-8834), furniture pieces such as these ottomans have to do "double duty" in small homes that use the same space for multiple functions.

Furniture helps alleviate the squeeze

"These ottomans are very versatile and can be used for home offices, living rooms or dens," she says.

"I have a woman from Rockport, Me., who is ordering them for her cottage to use at the table as a bench. When the kids visit, the ottomans can be pulled out to be used as beds."

There's also a large selection of fabrics to choose from so these ottomans can be matched with any decor, she adds.

Urban Mode also carries a cigar lounge that becomes a queen size bed, as does a sectional couch with chaise lounge.

The store also has beds with storage space instead of a box spring, Sundberg says. "This is the perfect area to store out-of-season clothing or extra linen. It can all be customized."

BoConcept (www.boconcept.ca), a Danish company located at 230 Adelaide St. E., also carries a line of multi-purpose sleepers, including ottomans that convert to beds. They come in multiple sizes, with a wide selection of fabrics in varying prices.

Design consultant Larkin Vipond says ottomans are popular, but a 68-inch double-seated sofa bed is one of BoConcept's (647-352-8802) best sellers. "It slides down into a queen-size bed. You never have to pull it out."

The store also has a coffee table with a height and width that doubles in size so that it turns into a dining room table that's approximately 55 by 28 inches. Another space-saving coffee table has a shallow storage area with lids that flip up and become small workspaces. Vipond says it's ideal for using a laptop while you sit on the couch.

BoConcept also carries a selection of dining-room tables that expand in size. These extension tables have built-in leaves that extend the tables so that they practically double in size: the 36- and 55-inch tables become 72 and 95 inches, respectively. BoConcept's 18-inch wide console table doubles in width to become a small dining room or work table.

A similar style Canadian-made console table can be found further north at Shelter (416-783-3333), a modern and contemporary furniture store (www.shelter-furniture.ca) at 885 Caledonia Rd. Design consultant Nicole Howard, says this flip-top table console table measures 18 by 48-inches closed and doubles in width to become a work or small dining table.

"It's a great solution to space saving. You can use it as a console table in a foyer or behind a sofa, or it can be used as a desk. It's whatever you make it."

Shelter sells couches that can be customized for small spaces. Buyers can choose from a variety of finishes. "You pick a size and a fabric swatch and depending on the manufacturer, leg and arm finishes and cushion fills are customizable."

Apartment-size sofas are about a foot shorter than standard couches, which are about 90 inches in length, and people generally choose a smaller depth for a less bulky look, says Sundberg of Urban Mode. The store also has a range of sofa styles and fabrics to choose from.

BoConcept also offers a selection of sofas in a range of depths. Most of their couches are modules so the lengths of their sofas are very flexible.

Pieces that do double duty can help maximize small spaces.

Both BoConcept and Urban Mode sell modular shelving for wall units that can be adjusted in size. Such wall units are important design features for maximizing vertical space in small condos, says Weigen-Liebovitz.

"Many condos have lots of windows, but little wall space, so you have to take advantage and make the best use of whatever vertical space you have for practical reasons. You need to plan for storage."

As soon as the weather gets warmer, people love to head north to cottage country.

And Anita Latner of Anita Latner Realty Inc. specializes in finding that perfect property in Muskoka for you.

"I always say that if your house is your castle, then your cottage is Camelot," Latner said. "It's the last best place to be."

Latner started coming up to Muskoka almost 50 years ago, making the trip with her family to go to their cottage.

Now Latner lives up there and gets to do what she loves, having now sold properties in and around the area for close to 25 years.

"When I took the real estate exam years ago, I had no desire to sell houses," Latner said. "It was always my desire to be in the country.

"It's just a different lifestyle."

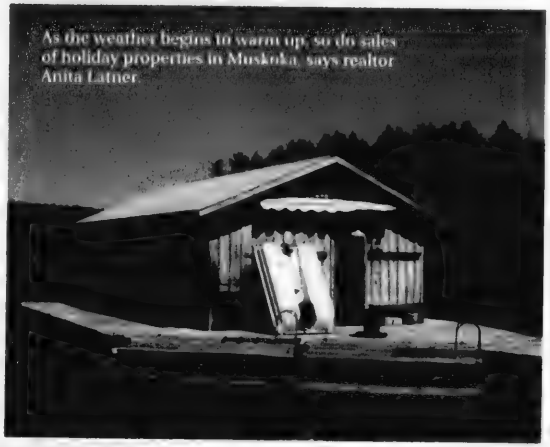
The cottages themselves range from rustic to palatial, and are priced accordingly.

"It depends on the amount of shoreline that you want, and what [body of water] you want to be on," Latner said. "On Lake Muskoka, Lake Joseph and Lake Rosseau, you can find a teeny bit under $1 million, but not much, and upward from there."

As the cottages grow, so too does the need for their space.

"Some of the high-end places, you want 300 to 500 feet of shoreline," Latner said. "One hundred used to be big, and now 200 is nothing special.

"You need 300 to 400 feet for some cottages, and then some of it is the land, exposure and view."



As the weather begins to warm up, so do sales of holiday properties in Muskoka, says realtor Anita Latner.

As the weather begins to warm up, so, too, do cottage sales, as Latner says that there are only about six months in which most properties are purchased.

And although it's a little farther than some of the cottages in Simcoe County, Latner believes that the Jewish population's migration north of the city of Toronto cuts down on the drive.

"I like to joke that Centre Street [in Thornhill] is halfway to Bracebridge," said Latner with a laugh. "It isn't, but the more people live in the suburbs, the less distance it is.

"Some people feel it's worth the drive, and our scenery is unbelievable."

Latner finds that many people are spending more time at the cottage in lieu of a big property in Toronto, and instead typically split their time between Muskoka in the warmer months and Florida during the colder ones.

"They're up at the cottage for longer, and incorporating more country-club activities," said Latner, noting that there are now plenty of golf courses in the region. "If you've worked hard all your life, it's nice to cut back and enjoy that lifestyle."

It's also a great meeting place for the different generations to spend some time with each other.

"You'll maybe go over to someone's house for Friday night dinner or the High Holidays, but here, it's a whole week or weekend with your family, and a chance for everyone to be there together," Latner said.

There aren't many more fun places to do it at, either.

"If you ever went to camp, the closest you're going to get to that experience again is a cottage in Muskoka," Latner said. "It's so much different with a recreational property.

"When I go out with my contemporaries up here, I still feel like a kid at camp."

To get a better idea of what properties are available for purchase, you can find Latner online at www.anitalatner.com, where listings are displayed on the website.

Choosing flooring? Dominion Rug adds a personal touch

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Choosing the perfect flooring for your home can be a daunting task, especially if it is your first time. You want to reflect your personal preference and decorating style, but you also want quality products that are within your budget.

Luckily, Dominion Rug & Home (416-485-9488) has the selection and expertise to help make your choice easy.

Founded in 1947, it sells quality carpets and rugs, as well as hardwood, cork and luxury vinyl flooring.

Founded in 1947, Dominion Rug sells high quality carpets and rugs in addition to hardwood, cork and luxury vinyl flooring. In their new location at 52 Samor Rd. near Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue, the store offers products that have been sourced by experts and imported from all over the world.

"We carry contemporary styles and are always on top of the latest trends" says Ben Baum, the owner of Dominion Rug & Home since 1984. "Our store has evolved over the years to keep up with the current market. Its like the fashion industry – nothing stays the same for very long."

Dominion Rug & Home works with top-notch technicians and designers to create their high-end products. The company is one of only 100 carpet showrooms in North America to be a member of the International Design Guild, which means it is affiliated with the highest-end designers and allows the company to get exclusive products at better prices.

Staff will work with customers to stay within their specified budget and help choose the right carpets and colour schemes for their needs. The store showroom is user-friendly and set up by category to help people quickly find what they are looking for. Samples can be borrowed so that the purchasers can see how something would look in their home.

The latest trends include grey carpeting, which is "the new neutral," according to Baum, as well as colourful area rugs.

"Blue, purple and emerald green are the new hot colours," he said. "People are getting braver and want that pop of colour."

Luxury vinyl, a material that mimics the look of hardwood, marble or slate floors, is increasingly popular because it is so easy to maintain. "It has no moisture problems so it's an excellent product for basements," Baum said.

Customers of Dominion Rug & Home can expect fast service, and a technician will measure your home and give you a quote within a week.

What really makes Dominion Rug stand out from other businesses is its customer service.

"You always hear people talk about the golden standard of customer satisfaction. We go beyond that and follow the platinum rule," Baum said.

"We add a personal touch that only a family company like ours can offer. We truly care about our customers and don't just want to sell them a product – we want to take care of them."

Baum is proud of his team of staff who collectively have more than 100 years of experience in the area. One employee recently celebrated his 52nd anniversary with the company.

"We really know what we're selling. We can make the right recommendations for our customers so they trust us and develop a lifelong relationship with us."

Grey carpeting is the new neutral.

Adenat does it all – before and after you move in Multi-faceted real estate and building firm takes care of everything

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It's an ever-changing real estate market out there, but Adenat is always ahead of the curve.

It's a multi-faceted company that can take care of everything involved with buying, leasing or maintaining your home, from the initial listing to removing snow from your driveway.

"We had so many listings of our own, it just got easier to manage it ourselves, rather than have other agencies doing it," said Adenat's founder and president, Israel Schwartz.

This year, most of their work, especially with new properties, has dealt with leases.

"In 2013, on the rental side, the market has gone up a lot," Schwartz said. "Most first-time buyers can't buy, so they're into rentals."

This is also the case for those who are well-established.

"At the high end, many people are sitting on the fence," Schwartz said. "There isn't much ability to buy new homes, so they rent them."

Schwartz believes that one reason behind this is the increasing costs involved, particularly when it comes to adding the harmonized sales tax (HST) to the mix.

Giving an example of purchasing a piece of land for $850,000 and then building a 4,000-square-foot home for $1 million, the HST addition increases the cost from $1.85 million to about $2.1 million, before even adding in things such as the agent's cut.

"In order to sell a $1.85-million project, you have to go over $2.6 million to get any money at all from it," Schwartz said. "HST kills the builders and makes for much more expensive homes."

It's even done so in the Clanton Park area between Wilson and Sheppard avenues west of Bathurst Street, which is what Schwartz considers "the last pocket that still has reasonable lots at reasonable prices.

"Adenat spent significant amounts of money and developed in the area," Schwartz said. "In the end, we didn't sell any homes except for one of them.

"They're all under rental now."

Adenat is looking to address the need for more living space for young couples in Toronto, but one of Schwartz's plans – which will be ideal for the Orthodox community – is a couple of years away.

"I still have two acres in the Bathurst and Wilson area, and when I put it together, I think I can add a significant amount of condos to an area that needs them badly," said Schwartz, who also hopes to erect an Orthodox-friendly hotel and community centre on the site.

"I'm still working on the zoning and planning now, but I think that will bring a fresh new residence to the area."

One of the advantages of working with Adenat is that its staff can do pretty much everything you'll need, even well after the sale. The company has its own tradespeople to work in your home, as well as a separate Custom Kitchen division.

"There are over 2,000 rental units in the Jewish areas, whether basements, homes or apartments," Schwartz said. "How many plumbers do you need? Or carpenters, or drywallers, or electricians?

"You might as well own your own kitchen company instead of calling out every time you need to do something," he added. "[With all of the different handymen] on staff, it's basically very harmonized."

And even if you don't rent or buy from Adenat, their kitchen company is still up for hire, with more than 15 years of experience under their belts.

"You do it yourself, you build it up yourself, and the only complaints you can have are with yourself," Schwartz said. "It's much more efficient."

Adenat can be found online at www.adenathomes.com, and appointments can be arranged with Adenat's custom kitchens department by calling 416-784-4440.

Adenat builds, sells, leases, maintains and renovates homes.

Dragon Condos is steps from everything

Chinatown building right in the heart of downtown T.O.

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

A new, ultra-modern condominium building in the heart of Toronto's Chinatown is creating a buzz.

Dragon Condos, in the preconstruction phase by Ideal Developments, features 10 stories of stylish living with retail on the ground floor. Located at 270 Spadina Ave., at Dundas Street West, it has 95 luxury suites.

Communal amenities include a rooftop patio revealing striking city views, a theatre lounge with a projector and AV entertainment system, a party room with caterer's kitchen, island bar and fireplace and a fitness centre offering a cardio, yoga, weights and aerobics area.

Twenty-four hour concierge service welcomes you home, and each suite also comes with a limited-edition bicycle so homeowners can easily reduce their carbon footprint.

Dragon Condos is sublimely located in downtown Toronto. Situated in the heart of the vibrant Chinatown, it has all the conveniences of downtown living.

It is close to Kensington Market, the Fashion District, the University of Toronto, Ryerson University, the Royal Ontario Museum, the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Eaton Centre, while theatres, cinemas, restaurants and shopping close are also close by.

The streetcar stops just steps from your front door, providing seamless access to the subway, Go Transit and Via Rail. Hospitals such as Mount Sinai and Toronto Western are also close by.

"More than 75 per cent of the suites already have been sold," says Ben Murray, project manager for the company.

"Given the culturally rich neighbourhood that surrounds Dragon Condos, the recreation opportunities and eclectic shopping, we're confident the remaining one-bedroom and two-bedroom plus den suites will sell fast, too."

The remaining one-bedroom suites are 550 square feet and starting at $344,900, and the two-bedroom plus dens are 850 square feet, starting at $529,900.

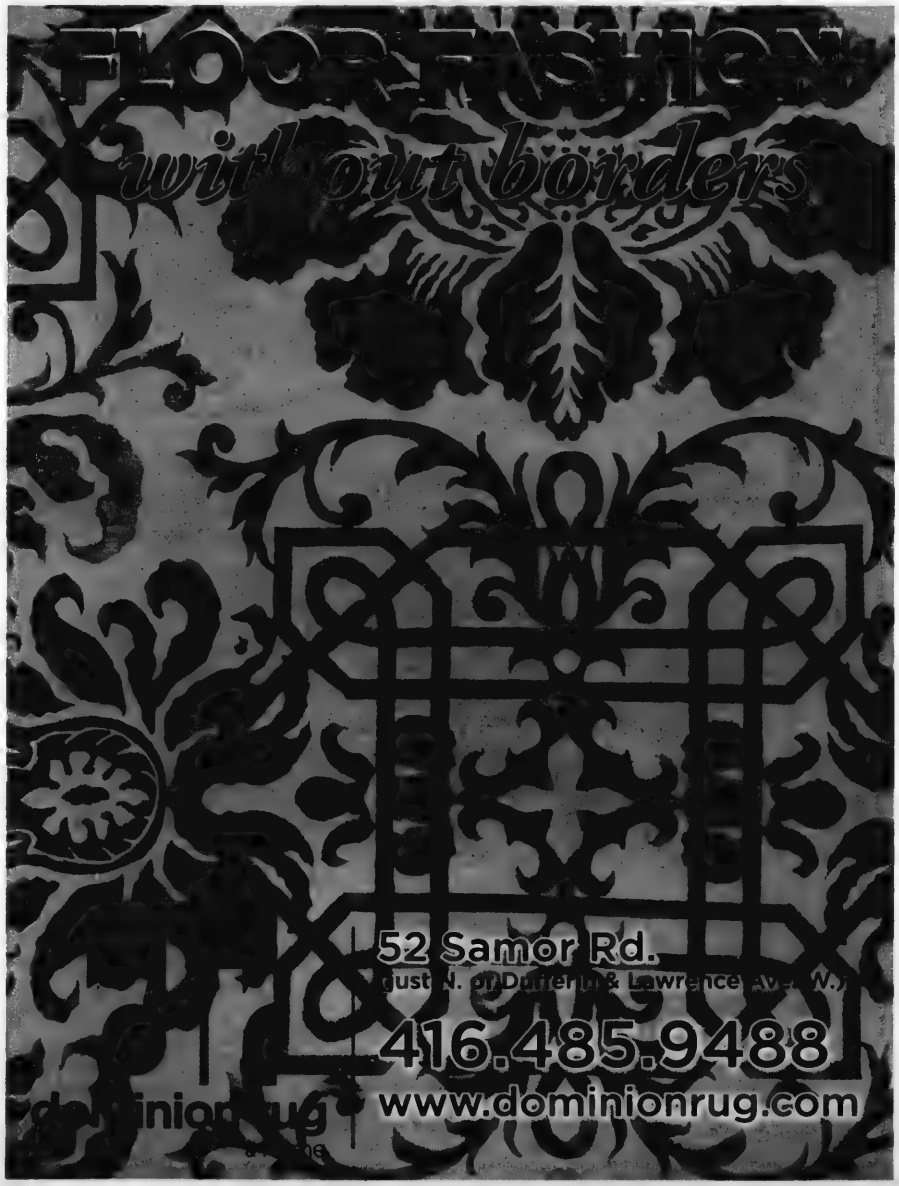
The project is in the preconstruction stage, and the estimated completion date is spring 2015.

This is the second multi-residential project for Ideal Developments. The first was Markham Gates, a stacked townhouse project with 44 units at Markham Road and Sheppard Avenue East in Scarborough.

The company, founded 12 years ago, has focused on custom homes, additions and renovations.

For more information, visit the Dragon Condos sales centre at 270 Spadina Ave., call 416-847-7999 or click on to www.dragoncondos.com.

The Spadina streetcar will be just outside your door.



Space Solutions helps to maximize your closets

Compiled by CJN Staff

Whether you need a new closet system or already have one to maintain, Harry Levinson, senior designer at Space Solutions (660 Eglinton Avenue E., 416-322-5575, spacesolutions.ca), offers some tips on keeping your closet spaces organized.

"When you're ready to take control of your closet, simply call Space Solutions, and we'll help you transform your closet," Levinson says.

"We've been making small closets big since 1986."

Here are some of his suggestions.

• Sort, sort, sort: Empty your closet and create piles for each type of clothing item – shirts, pants, skirts, work-out wear, etc. Also sort accessories you keep in your closet, such as ties and belts, scarves and shoes.

• Purge, purge, purge: You will probably find things you haven't worn in years – styles have changed, and maybe there are things that no longer fit. Decide whether you still need to hold on to them. If they're in good shape but you don't want them any more, consider donating them.

• Take inventory: After paring down your stuff, you should have a good idea of how much of what types of storage you need. Double-hung rods for shirts and other short-hanging items can allow you to compress the space needed and free up more real estate. Full-length hanging for longer items such as dresses or pants can allow for shelf space above or shoe storage below. Consider drawers for sweaters, sleepwear, lingerie and other such items.

Pullout shelves for shoes and handbags can take advantage of your closet's depth without sacrificing its width. Ties and other hanging accessories can be mounted on open walls, backs of doors or even on the sides of any shelf towers, and these can often slide forward for easier access.

• Design: Once you've assessed your needs, consider an amazing closet system from Space Solutions, making use of all the available space in your closet and greatly improving its functionality.

Some other closet tips:

• Use hard-to-reach corners for out-of-season or special-occasion clothes.

• Custom jewelry trays can make great in-drawer accessory organizers.

• Using the same type of hanger for all garments lets things hang more evenly and makes them easier to sort and find.

Ortal fireplaces from Israel are sleek and modern

Available in Canada from The Fireplace Specialist

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to The CJN

Israeli innovation is nothing new, but in the world of fireplaces, it's a bit of a surprise for a country not known for its chilly climates.

But thanks to Ortal Heat, Israel is producing some of today's most exciting home fireplace solutions. And whether you're building a house or upgrading your current space, Ortal fireplaces are now available in Canada through The Fireplace Specialist (905-761-6984; warmth.com).

According to The Fireplace Specialist's Maggie Leighton Costelloe, Ortal has been selling its fireplaces "in Europe for quite some time and are now introducing them in North America." The designs are "very sleek – contemporary and modern."

Ortal is also the first company to offer a three-sided borderless glass fireplace: "normally, there would have to be metal trim to hold each piece of glass in place." This design allows for uninterrupted enjoyment from several areas of the home at once.

A unique design feature even lets you incorporate a fireplace in ways you'd never imagined. The Fireplace Specialist sales manager Satesh Beharry says art and even electronics aren't a problem over an Ortal fireplace. "Most fireplaces don't allow you to use drywall, wood, anything combustible on top," he says, but with a built-in air cavity to channel heat away from the area above the fireplace, "the wall above the fireplace stays at room temperature at all times."

Ortal offers 65 different models, ranging from 15 to 77 inches wide, in single-sided, double-sided and three-sided varieties. Turnaround time, from order to delivery, is four to six weeks.

The 30-year-old company – family-owned and based in Hod Hasharon in central Israel – says its products meet current safety standards not only in North America (CSA), but also in Europe (CE) and Israel, perhaps the only company to do so. And despite the modern look and design, and high efficiency ratings, you won't have to sacrifice old-fashioned warmth and comfort: every Ortal fireplace is also designed to maximize radiant heat – the cozy feeling of curling up fireside.

With more than 25 years' experience installing fireplaces in the GTA, The Fireplace Specialist can work with new construction or come into an existing home, co-ordinating with homeowners, contractors, designers, architects and others involved in the project.

More than just installation, The Fireplace Specialist offers comprehensive design services to perfectly suit the space and home in which the fireplace will be a lasting centrepiece.

"We do full-featured walls," says Costelloe, "including wall units, to make the fireplace a focal piece in the home... It can be the entire wall, including granite, marble. We work with the client to give them exactly what they want."

The company is well-known for fireplace makeovers, she adds. "We take an old, ugly fireplace – we don't necessarily have to rip it out, especially if it's a wood-burning brick fireplace. We can take that and make it over so it looks like a brand-new fireplace."

Turnaround time from order to delivery is four to six weeks.

Other clients opt for a conversion from wood to gas. "It's quite beautiful," she says. One of the biggest surprises when clients have converted a fireplace is how often they actually end up using it. "People don't realize how much they're going to enjoy their fireplace." Where clients might have used a wood fireplace once a year, with no wood to store and transport, and no cleanup afterward, "they just press the remote control" to get far more enjoyment out of it.

"The key compliment we get from our clients... is the quality of our service," says Beharry. The company does a yearly followup to make sure the fireplace is working well. And if there is ever a problem, they'll take care of it. "Homeowners call us six years after a job has been completed, and we're there within days to service our unit if there's anything wrong."

Beyond Ortal, The Fireplace Specialist carries other quality brands, including Montigo, STUV woodburning, Lennox, Heatilator and Bio Fuel, as well as electric fireplaces and outdoor fireplaces and fire features.

While the company's Vaughan showroom is a great place to get inspired and start planning, visits are "primarily by appointment," Costelloe says, so clients can receive a consultant's undivided attention.

Please call 905-761-6984 or visit warmth.com for more information.

Planning can lessen the stress of moving

Elaine Cohen
Special to The CJN

Although moving is arduous, you can alleviate stress by planning ahead. Calendars serve as excellent tools. Set reminders for everything from cancelling subscriptions to packing priorities. When a task is completed, cross it off the list.

• Change of address notification

Make a list of government departments and agencies, schools, clubs, corporate and charitable organizations, utilities, Internet and television providers, health professionals, friends, relatives, neighbours and other contacts.

Use online links, email, the telephone and snail mail to inform your contacts of your address change. Attend to this chore soon after leasing the apartment or acquiring a home. For a fee, Canada Post (www.canadapost.ca) will redirect mail for either six months or a year. Ideally, mail should bypass the former address and arrive at the new premises.

But don't rely on Canada Post to do all the work. Go online, phone and send changes of address to ensure important documents such as driver's licences and car registration renewals, tax refunds, credit cards, financial statements, contracts, and bank statements arrive on time.

• Packing timeline

While some things can't be packed until the last minute, out-of-season clothes and sports equipment can be taken care of ahead of time. Check each box off the list and enjoy a feeling of accomplishment.

Collect clean cardboard boxes at stores or buy them from a local supplier. Make sure to have plenty of wrapping paper, bubble wrap and tape on hand. Packing supplies can also be ordered online.

To prevent newsprint stains and to avoid re-washing, wrap dishes and other fragile items in tissue, clear wrapping paper or tea towels. For lamps, ornaments and other large breakables, artwork and accessories, bath towels and blankets provide a protective buffer. Make use of big garbage bags and Styrofoam chips or filler for extra protection. Surround box seams with tape. Don't overload boxes.

Make sure to get small boxes as well as big ones. Last spring, Montrealers Burt and Annie Bettman, both graduate students, each packed large boxes with a slew of binders, books and research material. Burt was about to cart them, but after lifting one heavy bundle he decided otherwise.

"We had to empty the large cartons and repack everything in small boxes," he said. "Books may be easy to stack in a box, but it doesn't take many to weigh you down. Since then, we always use small boxes for books and binders."

Annie noted that large boxes came in handy for linen and clothes. The couple kept track of every item in each box by numbering the boxes and placing "fragile" labels on them. They helped the movers by colour-coding boxes to indicate where they should go in their new apartment. They also tracked the contents of each box in a notebook.

"It was a great time-saver, because we didn't have to dig into each box to find things," she said. "We simply referred to our notepad."

The recently married couple also received wedding gifts, and they prevented breakage by leaving each gift box and wrappings intact.

Don't assume that the movers will tape up bureau drawers and cart dressers filled with clothes. "Since we were moving to the 17th floor in a downtown highrise, we had to make sure the drawers were emptied. To fit in the elevator, the dressers had to be turned sideways," Burt explained, adding that under other circumstances, it may be possible to leave contents intact.

Before hiring a mover, get references and information about insurance. Efficient, reputable movers alleviate stress and get the job done right. Don't assume a mover will transport a piano, house plants or large mirrors. Also, find out if the mover reassembles furniture at the new dwelling.

Arrange to board or have someone take care of pets. According to veterinarians, cats and dogs, the latter in particular, often need time before they become comfortable in a strange environment. They miss their familiar scents and surroundings, but eventually they adapt and are content just to be with their owners.

Depending on finances and circumstances, it may be helpful to hire movers to do the packing and crating as well as the moving. However, don't wait until moving day to make that decision. Packing and crating is carried out before the actual moving day.

Get the dimensions of your rooms and make a mock layout of how furniture will be placed, according to the measurements and shape of each room in the new quarters. Don't assume every purchase will fit. One couple recalls being so enchanted with the location, view and size of their rooms, and the sunshine streaming in their new nest, that they overlooked the dimensions in the bedroom.

Constantia has "home" written all over it.

Constantia

The biggest compliment you can pay a retirement residence is, "It doesn't feel like a retirement residence. It feels like home."

That's how Constantia was designed. From the elegant suites to the sumptuous dining area, spacious grounds and rooftop terrace, every element of Constantia has "home" written all over it.

The second-biggest compliment? "I wish my home was this nice. I'm moving in tomorrow."

When the people saying that are 20 years shy of move-in eligibility, you know you've created an environment that provides not only comfort but also familial continuity. Our residents wouldn't have it any other way.

Retirement living: 'I should have done this sooner'

Active senior happy with move she previously resisted

Ruth Goldsmith
Special to The CJN

If you shudder at the thought of moving into a retirement home, think again. It may not be such a bad idea.

Most people are determined to age gracefully, and remain independent and active until... well, until the end, which of course we don't talk about.

No missed meals because she was too exhausted to bother cooking

We tell ourselves that we are going to be different: vibrant, active and busy.

Even after I retired and became a widow living alone, I resisted the idea.

I remember thinking "Maybe one day, but not now, not yet – some time in the distant future, whenever that is."

I was typical of my generation, determined to stay active and involved.

But slowly, one by one, my friends began to deteriorate, and I found myself spending my days visiting them, taking them on errands or serving their needs.

It began to be harder for me to keep going and take care of the ordinary tasks of daily living. The "some time in the future" became the "here and now."

I knew I had to make a change.

I would visit friends in a nursing home and was horrified by the silence and listlessness of the residents. Even the retirement homes I would visit were disappointing, rigid and more like an impersonal hotel than a real home.

I knew that one of these days I would end up in a place like that, but not now, not yet.

But as time went by, I learned that the secret to successful aging is accepting that change is inevitable and will happen to everyone sooner or later. So I decided to deal with it ahead of time.

One day I read an ad in The Canadian Jewish News about a new retirement home close to where my daughter and her family lived. Sheer curiosity prompted me to investigate.

They offered a free trial stay for a few days, and I decided to take advantage of the offer. The warmth and understanding that emanated from the staff and residents changed my life forever.

I had a delightful time. It was a pleasant holiday, with friendly people, comfortable surroundings and the best possible fitness and exercise programs.

I returned home and realized that I was missing out on the good life, so I made the decision to move.

Maybe this aging process wasn't going to be so bad after all.

My family and friends were shocked.

"You moving? But you're fine!"

"Yes," I replied, "but for how long?"

I decided to make the move while I was still able to make my own decisions on where and how to live. I decided to deal with the issue while I was still in charge.

Just as I have prepared a will and powers of attorney, or downsized to an apartment, why not prepare for a comfortable, serene old age with as high a quality of life as possible?

I found a moving company that handled all the details, who packed, unpacked and disposed of my surplus belongings. It was so simple.

Moving into a retirement home was rather like learning to use a computer. The hard part was learning the basic skills.

The first computer lesson was the hardest, just like the first meal at my retirement home.

I walked into the dining room and faced a sea of unfamiliar faces. I wondered, "What am I doing here?"

Then the hostess took me to a table, and before I knew it, I had met a new group of friends.

I am now eating well, exercising, socializing and keeping my brain and body active with programs on a daily basis.

Without even realizing it, I am keeping all those resolutions I used to make about eating well, relaxing and just plain enjoying daily life. All the advice I had been ignoring all my life was suddenly easy to do.

I was amazed at how quickly I adjusted to my new surroundings and to new people. To my pleasant surprise, I found the experience rejuvenating. No more worries about shopping in bad weather. No missed meals because I was too exhausted to bother cooking. And no lonely weekends when my family and friends were too busy to make time for me.

She's finally keeping all those resolutions.

At first I thought it might be too expensive to live in a retirement home, but after I settled in, I found that my overall budget was about the same.

No more groceries, household help, taxis, restaurant and prepared meals, or even movies any more. But the quality of my life was incomparable.

Even my fear of the future abated.

The inevitable decline in my ability to function would be taken care of. Whatever changes come my way will be looked after.

But not now. Not yet.

I'm too busy enjoying life

Two years later, I still wonder: what took me so long?

Enjoy Muskoka at Touchstone Resort

Five-star property offers fractional ownership

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

There's nothing like the beauty of Lake Muskoka, a destination Ontarians have long been flocking to for replenishment and a respite from their harried working lives.

The choice of accommodation at the lake just reached a new level with the completion of the residences at Touchstone Resort, a five-star property that offers fractional ownership.

The resort, designed to accentuate seaside architecture, features an infinity pool on the Muskoka waterfront, a spa where services incorporate the flora and minerals indigenous to the lake, a fitness centre and a casual restaurant, Taste, offering contemporary cottage cuisine.

Touchstone, located on the lake between Bracebridge and Port Carling, is close to Bracebridge's downtown core, which offers galleries, museums, shops, restaurants, banking, theatre and a sportsplex.

> It's like owning a cottage, but without the work and the cost.

The Bala Musuem is a few minutes' drive, as is Gravenhurst, with the Steamship Segwun and the Opera House. The area comes alive with festivals such as the Muskoka Lakes Music Fest and the Bala Cranberry Fest.

But all year long, there's plenty to do in and around Touchstone.

In summer, boating, sailing, biking, swimming, tennis and golf are popular, while spring and fall are great for hiking and biking.

Touchstone is close to some of Ontario's best downhill and cross-country ski hills and trails for winter activities.

On May 10, Gordon's Estate Services will open bidding in an online auction for the residences at Touchstone, with 75 fractions available, each one sold in eighths.

The auction will occur in three stages. The first is for the Grand Lodge Studios, with reserve bids ranging from $4,500 to $5,000. Reserve bids for the second stage, for Grand Lounge two-bedroom spa suites, will range from $14,000 to $27,500, and the third stage, for three- and four-bedroom Grand Muskokan beachside cottages and villas, will range from $22,500 to $25,000.

Residences go beyond the cottage concept.

The advantage of an online auction is that potential purchasers can bid from the comfort of their homes "without feeling intimidated or rushed," says Manson Slik, partner/broker at Gordon's Estate Services.

Open houses are available for each stage on May 11 and 12, June 8 and 9 and July 5 to 22.

"This private, exclusive lakefront paradise will be home to no more than 40 families at any given time," says Slik.

"It's like owning a Muskoka cottage without the work and the cost. But these residences are so beyond the cottage concept. The studios feel like a luxury hotel room, while the two- to four-bedroom waterfront units are in self-contained lodges."

To participate in online bidding, pre-register at touchstoneauction.com with a credit card on hand.

"Your credit card won't be charged unless you're a winning bidder, in which case charges will only be for a deposit," Slik says.

See, taste, learn, then choose appliances at Caplan's

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

The kitchen is the most important room in your home – it's the only room that every member of the house uses every single day. Often, a kitchen is more than just a place to find food, but also a centrepiece for the home. A modern kitchen creates the kind of atmosphere that draws people into the room, and by investing in high quality large appliances like the ones sold at Caplan's Appliances (416-767-1655, www.caplans.ca), homeowners can make their kitchen beautiful.

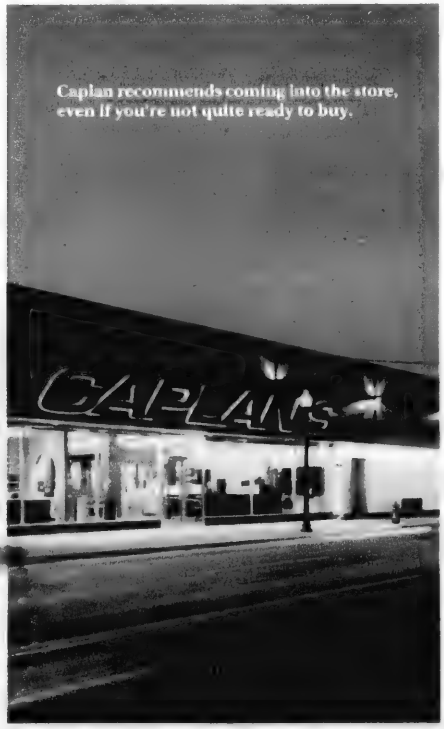
Caplan's, located at 1111 Weston Rd., is a third-generation family business that has been around for over 60 years. The company specializes in premium brands including Bosch, Dacor, KitchenAid, Viking, Miele, SubZero and Wolf. The appliances are presented in designer kitchen galleries, and the store employs chefs that do cooking demonstrations.

"It's a way for the customers to see how the appliances work," said Robert Caplan the store's president. "We want to show people what we're all about."

Across the street from the main store, Caplan's has a gallery that sells Miele appliances. A full-time chef cooks seasonal foods there to demonstrate how the appliances work.

"The idea is to educate our customers, so they'll learn to love the products as much as we do," Caplan said. "We want our customers to really love our products and to get the most enjoyment from them."

For customers thinking about buying new appliances, Caplan recommends coming into the store, even if you're not quite ready to buy. "Come see us, absorb as much information as you can, and then go home and think about it."



Caplan is very proud of his sales team, most of whom have over 20 years of experience with the products. "We're some of the most highly trained people in the country," he said. "We want to help you pick what's right for you, and we can find the right products at any price point."

Some trends in appliances right now include steam cooking or convection cooking. "These are two fast cooking methods that are more effective and safer than gas ovens," Caplan said. Putting panels on items like refrigerators and dishwashers so that they blend in with cabinetry is also popular. "It creates a more streamlined, modern look," Caplan said. "It's very European looking."

Another unique feature of Caplan's Appliances is its presence in social media. They have an active Facebook page (https://www.facebook.com/caplans) where they post recipes, design ideas and tips for cleaning and maintaining appliances. They also advertise special promotions and invite group members to events held at the store.

Caplan's also has a series of YouTube videos featuring staff members demonstrating how appliances work. "This allows people to browse our store from the comfort of their homes," Caplan explained. "We're always looking for ways to make shopping with us a better experience."

Adventures in real estate

Local agents relate some of the oddest, most difficult and just plain funny moments they've encountered in their careers

Helen Winer
Sales Representative
Alan Newton Real Estate Ltd. Brokerage

Once, at an open house, the owners' dog was put on the balcony so potential buyers would not be disturbed. When the open house finished, I went upstairs to let the dog in and proceeded to go downstairs. The dog blocked the stairs and wouldn't let me go down, nipping at my heels. I was frightened, which was exacerbated because I had a fear of dogs. I went into the bedroom, called my office to let them know I was having a problem with this animal.

Both phones were on speaker, and I was further agitated listening to everyone in the office laughing hysterically. One agent decided to talk to the dog on speaker phone and miraculously calmed the dog. The dog backed off, I ran downstairs while the dog was still looking at the phone, locked up and left. It took me a long time to live that one down.

One of the biggest challenges when selling a house is the decluttering of a home that's been lived in for many years. It's amazing how much one family can accumulate. This beautiful home was buried in reams of stuff. From kids' artwork all over the walls and a sea of items covering the dining room table to piles of toys in every room. This house needed work. I provided the client with a room-by-room list of what had to be eliminated, rolled up my sleeves and got busy. They were so diligent in decluttering, they didn't waste any time removing everything... and I mean everything!

I had to bring some extra "clutter" from my own house and buy some nice tchatchkes to stage the now almost-empty house. In the end, the hard work they put into preparing was well worth it. Most of the items they stored never even made it to their new home.

Broker David Eichorn recalls one very uplifting house showing.

"The husband's out of town with the only key to the lower-level garage. His wife gives us permission to have a locksmith pick the lock. But once it's unlocked, it can't be locked again. Inside the garage is a classic motorcyle. The wife tells us it's her husband's pride and joy and asks us to ensure its security. So I shlep it up the stairs and put it in the living room. Four months later, my muscles are still sore."

Memo to the broker who desires a reputation for shlep: be careful what you wish for.

Dogs and cats are your best friends... except when you're selling your home.

It's hard to think of your beloved pets as problematic but when it comes to selling your home, they can be an issue. Being an animal lover myself I have no concerns about entering a pet-occupied home. For buyers, it can be a total turn-off and, sometimes, a complete barrier to entry.

My own experiences include: the barker dog who never stopped with strangers in the house; the Velcro cat who followed my every step doing figure eights around my ankles; the untrained dog who defecated on the floor, and the jumper with nails who, every time someone arrived, scratched the freshly painted door trim, not to mention me.

The best you can do for your pet's peace of mind and your own, and to help your sale, is to find someone to care for them during the sale period – hourly, daily or for a few weeks as necessary.

The craziest moment we had was with one set of new clients. The first listing we sent them was on a Sunday night – an MLS listing that just came onto the market. As soon as they received the email listing, they called us and told us to prepare an offer immediately, as this was the perfect house for them. We faxed out an offer that same night as per their request, without them seeing the house or even knowing the exact location. The offer was accepted that night and the following day we did a home inspection, at which time they came and saw the property for the first time. They loved it and have been there for four years and could not imagine living anywhere else. To this day, we still cannot believe that someone bought a house without seeing it first.

Bathurst Street is a magnet for Jews

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

As the Toronto Jewish community continues to move northward, a number of parents in the Greater Toronto Area would like to see their children keep up with the trend of living in neighbourhoods close to Bathurst Street.

The Census Analysis Series based on the 2001 census was commissioned by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 2006 and written by Charles Shahar and Tina Rosenbaum. It reports that the history of Jewish residency since the mid-20th century can generally be described as a northerly migration that's mostly been concentrated close to Bathurst Street.

More than 66% of the community lives near the vital artery

More than 66 per cent of Jews living in the census metropolitan area (CMA) live along the Bathurst Street corridor between Dufferin and Yonge streets, the report says, and in southern York Region, about 11 per cent of the population are Jews. Similarly, about 11 per cent of the population of North York is Jewish, and Jews comprise about 21 per cent of the population along the Bathurst corridor.

Shirley Kellerstein, a wife and mother of two sons in their 20s, grew up a distance from the Bathurst corridor, which has "coloured" her thinking to this day, she said.

"My family lived in Belleville [Ont.] until I was a teenager. My parents were Holocaust survivors who immigrated to Montreal and then found a business opportunity in Belleville," Kellerstein said.

"There was a small Jewish community, but we were the only postwar Jews, so I always felt a little different. We didn't fit into the non-Jewish community or the Jewish community."

She doesn't remember any antisemitism, she said, until she was about 11, when "Peter and Rickey" – she still remembers their names – "suddenly called me a dirty Jew. They had always been friendly, and I never knew why they turned on me all of a sudden. I can only think that their parents or some friends must have said something to them."

Shortly afterward, she said, the family moved to Toronto. "We lived in a small house near Bathurst and Wilson, and suddenly there were Jews everywhere. It was culture shock, but a good kind of shock."

When she first became engaged, she said, her husband, a chiropractor, suggested moving to Alberta, where there were more job opportunities for him.

"I just couldn't go through that again. Belleville coloured me forever."

They moved to Thornhill, Ont., she said, because she wanted her kids to feel comfortable in their own neighbourhood.

"No Belleville for them."

Today her older son lives in the Reena community residence on the Lebovic campus in Vaughan, Ont., and her younger son is in graduate school in New York.

"I don't know where either of them will end up, but I hope they choose a Jewish neighbourhood," she said. "I think it's important."

Joan Steinberg, a Thornhill resident who is married with three grown children, grew up near Bathurst Street, but attended a largely non-Jewish elementary school.

"The boundaries were changed, and I was sent to a different school. I was one of two Jewish kids in my class.

"I had friends, but I remember being told that I pronounce words differently, and that I wouldn't be able join the nearby cricket and skating club. Little things constantly reminded me that I was Jewish and they weren't."

When she was single and living in an apartment in midtown Toronto, she said, she was determined "never to follow the young married Jews to Thornhill. I was going to be part of the downtown Jewish community.

"When I had my kids, though, my thinking changed. My friends were moving up north, and I realized there were great community centres, parks and schools," she added.

"We bought a house in Thornhill and my kids went to a public school that was largely Jewish. They felt much more at home in their school than I did in mine."

Her own children live on their own downtown, she said, but she believes they will make the trek up north when the time comes.

"They feel attached to the Jewish community. I can't tell them what to do, but I think they'll follow the community."
